Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, with respect to the Yukon Water Board I shall try to be more specific in my answer to Senator Balfour. According to advice I have received from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, he has from time to time extended to the territorial government of the Yukon the courtesy of accepting their suggestions with respect to appointments, which are his prerogative. However, with respect to the appointment of the chairman, it was the minister's wish and desire to make his own selection, and he did so, as Senator Balfour is obviously aware. He chose an individual who is well regarded in the Yukon, but who resigned shortly thereafter for reasons of which I am not totally aware.

With respect to the suggestions made by members of the Yukon territorial government, I understand that they were not acceptable to the minister. He has not advised me why that is so.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL GRANTS TO POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Only a moment ago did I have an opportunity to read the reply he delivered last evening to questions asked earlier by my colleague Senator Macquarrie and me concerning established programs financing. In the course of that reply the minister stated:

In fact, provinces have not... been passing all the increasing EPF payments on to the colleges and the universities. As a consequence, EPF represents an ever-growing percentage of post-secondary operating costs.

● (1415)

My question is this: How does the minister reconcile that statement with the statistics put out by the Department of Finance and by Statistics Canada, as set out at pages 133 and 134 of the document entitled, Fiscal Federalism in Canada, which shows that in 1967-68 federal cash and tax transfers paid for some 60.8 per cent of the operating costs of post-secondary institutions; in 1976-77, 62 per cent; in 1977-78, 58.7 per cent; in 1980-81, 69.8 per cent; and in 1981-82, 63.6 per cent?

The statistics put out by the Department of Finance and by Statistics Canada indicate that over that period of time there has been very little change in the amount of post-secondary institutions' operating costs accounted for by federal cash and tax transfers.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I stated last night that I proposed to bring to the Senate additional information on this important subject. Hopefully, that further information can be provided in the near future.

For example, however, I understand that in the province of Prince Edward Island almost 100 per cent of higher education is supported by the federal government rather than by the provincial government. I hope to support this fact with more exact information and a statistical base at some future time.

Of course, the honourable senator has cited percentage figures rather than dollar amounts actually contributed by the federal government through tax transfers or direct grants. In dollar terms, the trend line over the years has seen an increasing amount of that burden supported by federal taxpayers.

Senator Murray: With regard to Prince Edward Island—and it is not my role in this place to speak for that province—the particular statistical anomaly to which the minister refers—and it is a statistical anomaly—is explained in some detail on pages 75 and 76 of the parliamentary task force report entitled Fiscal Federalism in Canada. While I will not quote from that document here, I would draw the minister's attention to that explanation.

When the minister is bringing in further information, will he undertake to answer this question: Accepting for the moment, for the sake of argument, the federal government's contention that the provinces are under-funding post-secondary education, why is the federal government encouraging them to continue under-funding by reducing its transfers?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the surprising fact about Senator Murray's line of questioning is that, as a mentor of the Right Honourable the former Prime Minister, Mr. Clark, he was a supporter, at one time, of discussing with the provinces new divisions of responsibilities. He supported the view that there should be a re-examination of cost-sharing programs, provincial and federal. This was part of the Conservative policy thrust, and this is precisely the process in which we are engaged as a government today—that is, to determine where the burdens lie; whether a disproportionate burden is being borne by the federal government; and whether the provincial governments, in certain areas, are bearing too much of that burden.

[Senator Murray.]

This is an essential part of the process largely set in motion by the Conservative government to re-examine where we stand with respect to the provinces and to attempt to make sure that there is not a costly duplication of services, federal and provincial, and that taxpayers' dollars will be spent efficiently. This is the whole thrust of the program which, apparently, today is being opposed so vociferously by Senator Murray. Frankly, it is difficult to understand where the Conservative Party really stands.

● (1420)

Hon. G. I. Smith: It is difficult to know what you are talking about.

Senator Perrault: You are a slow learner; that is your problem.

FISHERIES

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—CANCELLATION OF SCALLOP FISHING LICENCES

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to that autistic child across the way, the Leader of the Government. The question is not in the area of jurisdiction, where he can blame the provinces, but concerns deep-sea fisheries. We in the Atlantic region are disturbed by the greedy fishing-out of scallops on Georges Bank by the Americans. Our anxiety and concern about this are accentuated by what is going on in our own Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

In my beautiful home village of Victoria, I heard just the other day that fishermen who were granted licences to fish scallops in the Northumberland Strait found that, after obtaining their licences, and just hours before they put their dragnets into the water, their permission to fish had been cancelled.

There seems to be no way whereby clear-cut information on anything like a long-range basis can be obtained. I wonder if the minister from another province which has important fisheries can find out what in the world is going on in the federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Are they trying to make our fishermen an endangered species, just like the haddock?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Honourable Senator Macquarrie knows a great deal about international affairs. Surely he must admit the basic unfairness of his question. He is aware of the fact that we are involved in a dispute with a powerful neighbour; he knows the international problems involved in this entire question; and yet he suggests that there is some unilateral action which can be taken by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to correct what is a serious and worrying problem.

Senator Macquarrie, I am sure, knows that we are in the process of finalizing some outstanding technical details with the United States regarding the establishment of the Chamber of the International Court of Justice that will hear the Gulf of Maine Boundary Dispute. He is aware of that. Does he suggest that that process be aborted and that there be some action taken by the government to solve this problem facing the scallop fisheries on the east coast?

Once this negotiation with the United States is finalized, we will proceed to exchange instruments of ratification to bring the Boundary Settlement Treaty into force. Canada will appoint its own judge to the Chamber of the ICJ for this case. We are hoping to work out some modus vivendi with the United States government regarding conservation measures for Georges Bank scallops. It is a regrettable thing that is going on there now, and nobody regrets it more than members of the government.

The differences in our respective management approaches will, however, make this a difficult task. I am sure that Senator Macquarrie does not underrate the difficulty of that, given the nature of the negotiations with the Americans over the past few months and years.

These differences underline the urgency of having the boundary settled once and for all by binding international adjudication. Yes, there is a problem; yes, we are acting rapidly to attempt to solve the problem; but, no, it is not the fault of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, as the honourable senator has suggested.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, hard as it is to believe, it would appear that the honourable minister has misunderstood my question; harder still to believe is that I was not clear in putting my question. I was not asking for instant action on Georges Bank. I am not advocating gun-boat diplomacy. I was asking him why it is necessary, in the face of what has happened in the scallop fishing industry—and I concentrate on scallops—for our own government to act with such irrational uncertainty vis-à-vis our own fishermen. The United States has nothing to do with the granting of licences in Northumberland Strait, but the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is involved because of the short-range change of policy. This is affecting the fishermen most seriously. That is not what I want to know. Why do we have to add to the international problems certain domestic ineptitudes? That is my question.

● (1425)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question concerning the alleged issuance of a regulation prohibiting scallop fishing will be taken as notice. However, the general question relates to the diminishing size and supply of scallops and the danger in which this industry now finds itself.

Senator Macquarrie: I do not want to pursue this just because I used to teach geography, but Northumberland Strait and Georges Bank are not exactly side by side. My marine biologists would not say it is practically the same problem.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—STATUS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether he has been monitoring the progress of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline—the $30 billion project—and whether it has been delayed by any United States-Canada squabble over the National Energy Program and other developments.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have not been personally monitoring hearings that are now before both houses of the Congress, but I have been listening with interest to some Canadians and other people who have been down there. My impression at this time is that there is a rather in-depth examination of those component parts of the waiver package being undertaken, and that the explanations made by the Canadian sponsors of the pipeline here were well explained to the committees. I guess our assessment is that they are being held in a sound, responsible way and, indeed, that progress is being made on those explanations.

Senator Haidasz: Can the minister assure us that there is hope, at least, that the project will be put on stream before the end of 1983, as planned?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the 1983 date that was mentioned two or three years ago has long since been changed to an operational date, by the end of 1985. Indeed, that was contained in the resolution that was passed by the United States Senate, I believe, on June 27, 1980. It is well known that 1983 is no longer a feasible date for operation of that line.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

QUEBEC—FINANCIAL AID TO INDUSTRIAL COMMISSIONS

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Not regional, universal!

Senator Tremblay: —and for regional economic expansion as part of our overall economic development, since my question is concerned with regional economic expansion.

In this connection, yesterday morning in Le Devoir I read the following:

The Minister of State “responsible for Quebec Affairs”, Mr. Serge Joyal, announced Sunday evening that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion (DREE) was prepared to provide direct financial assistance to the industrial commissions which until now had been 30 per cent subsidized by the Quebec government.

Sunday evening, Mr. Joyal told reporters that DREE would be able to set aside “several millions per year” of its total budget envelope to help the commissions, whether or not they received assistance from the Quebec government.

In answer to questions by Le Devoir, the assistant deputy-minister at DREE for the Quebec region, Mr. Claude Huot, replied that two or three million dollars per year could be given in the form of direct aid to help economic development agencies.

I have the following questions: First, could the minister confirm that this is a definite plan on the part of the government and that the government intends to give $2 million or $3 million per year from now on to the industrial commissions in Quebec?

My second question is as follows: Does the government intend to include a plan of this kind in the general development agreement which, if I am correct, is still in effect between the federal government and the Quebec government, an agreement which covers various so-called subsidiary agreements for more specific projects, which could therefore also include assistance to industrial commissions?

If it be the government's intention to add such a program to the general agreement in the form of a subsidiary agreement, are negotiations now taking place between the federal Government and the Government of Quebec to have the agreement in question set up in the same way as similar agreements, also mentioned in the article, concluded with British Columbia and New Brunswick?

● (1430)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall communicate the text of the question to the minister responsible for regional economic expansion and to the Honourable Serge Joyal, Minister of State, and will try to obtain an answer as quickly as possible.

AIRLINES

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE WARDAIR

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development relating to the Government of Canada's policy concerning airlines, and more particularly Wardair, which, as the minister knows, is a western airline. Is it correct that the government has decided, and is firm in its decision, not to allow Wardair to become a third international carrier or even a national carrier?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice, because the honourable senator has asked whether it is a firm policy decision. I know that this matter of regional air carriers, as well as national and international air carriers, has been under consideration. It is necessary for me to check before I start making announcements for and on behalf of another minister. After an announcement has been made, I would be glad to provide an expanded explanation to satisfy my friend's legitimate curiosity.

Senator Smith: I believe I am able to thank the minister for his reply, but the warmth of my thanks depends upon whether I understood his answer correctly. Perhaps he will permit me to explore it a little further. Is he saying that he will reply more fully to my question after the minister responsible for the matter makes an announcement; or is he saying that he will make an inquiry and will provide the best answer he can, and if the policy declaration is made later he will then modify his reply? Exactly what did the minister mean?

[Senator Tremblay.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I believe what I said was perfectly clear, but I am prepared to repeat it and perhaps be more specific in reply to the supplementary question.

My honourable friend knows that the matter of regional air policy and a number of other related matters have been under active consideration for some time. Honourable senators opposite, including Senator Smith, have agreed that when such changes are being made there should be consultation with the people who are likely to be affected—in this case, the industry. I am not sure whether the minister has made any announcement directly related to the first part of the honourable senator's question. That is what I wish to check. I shall give a full and complete explanation if an announcement has already been made. If it has not, then, of course, I would take the advice of the Minister of Transport as to when he is prepared to make the announcement. I would then follow it and give a more detailed explanation after that.

● (1435)

Senator Smith: I appreciate the fuller explanation, honourable senators, and, I may say, from my point of view at least, the substantially clearer explanation which the minister has now given. I shall await with interest and anticipation his fuller reply.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE DEREGULATION

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Minister of State for Economic Development would be kind enough to inquire how the policy he will announce ties in with the speech made by the President of the Treasury Board to the Canadian Bar Association last month—I think it was around September 1—in which he said, in effect, that it is important to deregulate government control of various aspects of industry as quickly as possible—he mentioned some fairly early deadline, and I think it was 1982—by some policy or program, and to get rid of a great many regulations that inhibit the activities of industry.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, I will give that undertaking too. I do not quite see how that relates to the previous question, unless it relates specifically to air regulations—and perhaps it does. Of course, my honourable friend knows that we gave a commitment a long time ago, in response to a first ministers' meeting, that we were going to try to remove those regulations that were not serving a useful purpose, and where the paper burden produced in compliance with them, as well as the waste of the valuable time of a lot of employees, could be removed. I made a full and complete announcement only a few months ago here on some very significant progress that we had made on that question of removing the paper burden, and the regulations it is based on.

Senator Smith: Well, as the honourable gentleman points out himself, that undertaking was given a long time ago. What I am referring to now is a speech made by the President of the Treasury Board a matter of a few weeks ago, at the most, in which he seemed to indicate that so much remained to be done that there was still an unnecessary burden of regulation upon the consumers of this country which costs them, to use the words he is reported to have used, billions of dollars.

Senator Olson: Yes. I think I could expand my reply and tell the honourable senator that there was a termination date, or a sunset clause, if you like, to the so-called paper burden office, where they received a lot of recommendations from business and industry, and even from the service sectors, on a pretty broad basis. Those were responded to, and there was indeed a very significant reduction in that paper burden.

That office was, in fact, phased out, but I have to say—and I suppose this is along the lines of some of what the President of the Treasury Board said—that there was still a number of recommendations that had come in through that office that had not been finalized to the point of relieving the paper burden, and, of course, the regulations that give rise to the paper burden. Indeed, there are still some left.

As I say, that office no longer exists, but there is a capability within the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, with the Minister of State (Small Businesses), to continue that process. Certainly, as good ideas as to phasing out are produced they will be examined to find out whether the phasing out will cause problems.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman, and I shall continue to watch with interest to see what happens if the prophesy of the Treasury Board turns out to be true, namely, that this program will be completed by next summer.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—REDUCTION IN TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Recently the federal government and the Province of Prince Edward Island signed an agreement for the third phase of the Prince Edward Island Development Plan, an agreement which resulted in the reduction of transfer payments to the Province of Prince Edward Island by at least $100 million. Would the Leader of the Government enumerate those programs which are affected—that is, cut back or discontinued by the cut in the federal transfer payments to the province—and which have resulted in the loss of 161 civil service jobs, which have been terminated?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is a sad thing that the official opposition seems to literally wallow in any suggestion that there has been a cutback anywhere; that it has this penchant to look on the bad side of everything. The fact of the matter is that since the Honourable Bennett Campbell was brought into cabinet, a great deal has been done for Prince Edward Island. A number of positive agreements have been signed. If honourable senators would like some specific information on what has been done for that great province, I will be pleased to bring it to their attention very shortly.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, in reply to the statement made by the Leader of the Government, I would remind him that we on this side, like most Canadians, are in dire straits. One notices that on the edge of a strait there is a certain amount of muddy soil, and it is difficult to get out of the strait without wallowing through that soil.

The Leader of the Government said he would provide information. I would ask him if he will be kind enough to give us a list of the programs to be implemented. Could he inform us whether the programs initiated to replace those terminated will provide opportunities for those who have lost their jobs, particularly the 52 employees of the Department of Agriculture in an agricultural province?

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Perrault: When honourable senators are made aware of the contents of the budget, even the honourable gentleman may have difficulty restraining his enthusiasm. The information contained in the budget will bring real hope to him as an advocate of his province.

ENERGY

COLD LAKE AND ALSANDS OIL PROJECTS—PRESENT STATUS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on October 22 by Senator Manning which concerned the Cold Lake and Alsands oil projects.

I am informed that with respect to consultations between the government and the consortia, there have been technical meetings at the officials level. Of course, we would all like to see the resumption of these two projects. I will endeavour, therefore, to keep honourable senators abreast of any new developments.

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE INSTRUCTED TO MAKE STUDY

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, October 27, the debate on the motion of Senator Riley:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc. and, in particular, to examine

(a) the Federal Government's plans for reorganizing Canada's passenger train services announced by Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin on July 27, 1981;

(b) the changes in passenger train services effected by Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, dated August 6,

1981, made pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act; and

(c) the procedure followed by way of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 in varying the Canadian Transport Commission's Orders and Decisions respecting Canada's passenger train services.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I would begin by saying to my colleague, Senator Riley, that I moved the adjournment of the debate yesterday not in any objection to the motion which he has placed before the chamber. I fully support the objectives of the motion, because I think the subject of rail passenger transportation in Canada is something worthy of an in-depth committee study and review. I congratulate Senator Riley on his initiative in drawing this matter to the attention of the Senate, and I personally hope that his motion will be agreed to. It can do nothing but good.

I too, like Senator Riley, come from a community that has been seriously affected by the VIA Rail cutback. My home city is Saskatoon, which is on the main line of the CNR. The "Supercontinental" was an important part of the life of the community, though perhaps less so in the last few years. Nevertheless, it somehow seems incomprehensible that we in Saskatoon will no longer see that great "Supercontinental" coming through our city, even if it is true that not that many people use it.

Therefore, when I stand to speak to the motion, I want to put on record the concern of my community and that of my province over the procedures that have been followed with respect to the projected cutbacks which are effective on November 15. One of the major concerns, I believe, has to do with the way in which the cutbacks were announced—by way of an order in council. I do not think I will elaborate upon that; it has already been well documented. Normally, a series of hearings would have been held. This is a procedure that has been followed in the past. I believe that people in my area are concerned that the precedent which has been set by the government in this regard, as it affects the transcontinental rail services, could be used in other branch-line abandonments which would normally require the procedure of public hearings to allow people to state their views.

It is true that we think of the railway as a means of long-distance passenger travelling, with a certain nostalgia. I often say to my wife, "Wouldn't it be nice, instead of going by air to Ottawa, to travel by train?" We tend to think back to the days when we travelled in this way as students, or when we came east before air travel became so common, and it has that great nostalgic ring.

Unfortunately, however, that does not necessarily attract too many passengers. I, too, like the members of the opposition, am concerned about government deficits. I, too, am concerned about the quality of the passenger equipment on the railway. There is an estimated saving of $100 million in the proposals of the Minister of Transport. He has assured me that that money will be used to upgrade passenger facilities and equipment, so that, in fact, the equipment that will be used will be more up-to-date. I was rather astounded to discover that the equipment presently used on the transcontinental routes is an average of 23 years of age. That is not very new, as an average, for passenger equipment in what we would like to think of as a modern technological age. There are many new pieces of equipment that can be purchased with the amount of savings that will be made.

Having said that, I will say that, of course, I bleed, with Senator Riley, for my community. I bleed for the communities that will have no rail service. As you are aware, the plan is to eliminate the transcontinental service on the CNR line between Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Jasper and Vancouver. In its place there will be short inter-city runs. I agree that that is probably the future for railroads. I am not entirely sure whether, even with energy shortages, we will see any great number of people spending two or three days on the trains. Therefore, the objective is a good one.

Even so, I speak with mixed emotion. All honourable senators will have heard the old definition of a mixed emotion. It is what you feel when a fellow drives your mother-in-law over a cliff in your new Cadillac. I have this ambivalent feeling. I want to see money saved; I know the facts of life, yet I realize the pride of a community in being on the main line of a railroad, having the facilities and the service available, and the loss which it will feel at the discontinuance of that service. That hurts a little bit. I also have to feel for the 1,600 people who will lose their employment as a result of these changes. That fact has to be considered.

I have to feel, as well, for the communities that will lose their rail service completely. There will be commuter runs between Saskatoon and Regina to pick up the CPR transcontinental if one wants to go west to Vancouver, or east to Toronto or Ottawa. There will be a line from Saskatoon to Edmonton, on which there will be some sort of dayliner run. From what I gather, there will not be a line from Winnipeg to Saskatoon. A person who wants to travel by rail will have to go to Regina first, and then back up to Saskatoon. This will affect many major communities along the route, because they will be without rail transportation. Keeping that in mind, I have to say it certainly hurts. Not only is it a blow to the service but it is also a blow to regional pride. That is important, especially in some of the newer and smaller communities.

Some years ago, in my days as mayor of Saskatoon, I was involved as the representative of a whole group of communities at hearings objecting at that time to the CPR's removing its passenger service from Winnipeg through Saskatoon to Edmonton. For those of you who know the area, there was a line that went through Yorkton, Saskatoon and Wetaskiwin. That line had been running for 50 years—trains Nos. 51 and 52. I will always remember those numbers. That must be 20 years ago.

The mayors of all the little towns came to me and said, "You are the mayor of the largest community affected and we want you to be our spokesman." So I went to the hearing before the Board of Transport Commissioners, and I stated my case as strongly as I could. The lawyers and witnesses for the railroad showed how many passengers got on at every little station all the way along. Really, it was pretty discouraging. We would hear such things as, "Plunkett, Saskatchewan: Four people got on all year round." I am not sure that that is fair to Plunkett, but it may have been something like that.

They looked at the use made of the express service. People were using trucks because they made the handling of express easier. Nevertheless, the communities said, "We want the railway because it could snow in the winter and the highways could be closed, and we have to get in if somebody is sick"—the usual comments.

I was able to convince the board that they should delay their decision for a year so that we could see whether any improvement could be effected by the communities. The board did that. They said they would give us one more year, and then they would come back to look at the figures. Well, at the end of the year the board did come back to look at the new figures, and instead of there being four passengers getting on at Plunkett, there were only three. Instead of any improvement it was even worse, in spite of the fact that I had called in the heads of all these communities, the little chambers of commerce groups and so on, and had said, "Okay. You have a year now. Let's see what you can do to really improve the patronage of the railway in order to show that the railway is important to your communities." They had all agreed that they would do so. But, in fact, the figures that came in at the end of the year were even worse than those of the year before.

Consequently, when the hearings came there was a little bit of a whimper instead of a great cry, and the passenger service was eliminated. That is almost 20 years ago. Life has gone on, but it did hurt. I only cite that example to indicate the problems of a rail passenger service and of maintaining that service when perhaps more suitable alternative forms of transportation exist.

You know, sometimes statistics can really get you. On that Viva VIA train which came through our city a man by the name of Mr. Len Turple, a spokesman for the consumer lobby group Transport 2000, indicated that the "Supercontinental" last year carried more than 145,000 passengers between Winnipeg and Watrous, and 174,000 between Watrous and Edmonton. That would be through Saskatoon. Where Mr. Turple obtained his statistics I am not sure, but we then have a statistic given by the transport minister, who was quoted in the Citizen as saying:

An average of 18 persons use the Vancouver to Jasper service every day—

That is the other end.

—and this jumps to about 75 to 100 in the summer months.

So he suggested that it was hardly reasonable to run that whole train for the 100 people or so who would use it for three months of the year. What he does there, of course, is use the statistics relating to the people who get on in that area, and not the statistics relating to the through passengers. I presume that is what he has done, although again, as some people say, statistics are used by some people as a drunk uses a light post—more for support than illumination. When I look at the various statistics that are available, I find them very confusing. In the end, however, it seems to me that, unless there is a court injunction, the order will probably go through. As I say, it hurts, and yet it is understandable when we look at the overall transportation picture.

I would say, if this matter comes before our committee, that there could be some rather significant benefits, not in terms of the resumption of the transcontinental service, because it is probably beyond the power of our committee even to reactivate that—although I hope it can—but in terms of an improvement in the intercity service, because that really is important and it has been rather neglected by the railways. There is a need for improvement of time schedules. It is unbelievable how unrealistic many of the passenger schedules are in making connections with the main line, and providing the kind of service that customers should have, if they are to be attracted to using railway passenger service.

I even have another suggestion for Senator Riley when this matter comes before the Transport and Communications Committee. If things are so good on the "Supercontinental" during the summer months—and keep in mind that Jasper has been seriously affected by this cutback—then perhaps it would be feasible to run a second transcontinental during the three summer months. Perhaps it would fill right up, although it seemed to me as I listened to Mr. Pepin that the more passengers they have the more they lose. Again, it is like the businessman who said that every day he was open he lost money. Somebody asked him how he made a living, and he said, "Well, I close on Saturdays and Sundays." That may be the way it is with the passenger service—it seems to lose. The more passengers there are, the more trains have to be provided; the more trains, the more money seems to be lost on the bottom line.

Having said that to Senator Riley, I want to congratulate him again. I will vote for his motion. I wanted to express the concern of my area, and I thank honourable senators for listening to me this afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, October 21, the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled They Served—We Care, tabled in the Senate on October 20, 1981.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to respond to Senator Bonnell, who gave an excellent presentation in tabling the report entitled They Served—

We Care. His clear and precise presentation laid out in detail the background leading up to the Health, Welfare and Science Committee's inquiry into Bill C-40, and also its review of the inequities still remaining in the Veterans Charter, which the committee was able to do because there was the unanimous consent of the Senate to refer the annual report of the Department of Veterans Affairs to that committee.

Because one of the most important aspects of the committee's work embraced recognition of the veteran's spouse, I feel it is important to pay tribute to the lady members of the committee. Senator Bird, the deputy chairman, contributed, in my opinion, more than any other member. She wrote practically every word of the report. I commend also Senator Inman and Senator Rousseau.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: To emphasize their strength in the committee proceedings, I will say that their contribution was the subject of an article on the work of the committee in the War Amputees Association publication The Fragment.

Honourable senators, I feel I should also record the appreciation of the committee for the efforts of the executive director of the War Amputations of Canada, Mr. Cliff Chadderton, who in his capacity as a witness represented the National Council of Veterans' Associations, which takes in about 12 strong veterans' associations across Canada. The expertise reflected in his evidence was, in my opinion, the highlight of our proceedings; and he is deserving of every word of praise, not only for his help to the committees but also for his continuing devotion to the veterans' cause.

The report, as is reflected in the title, is directed, to a great extent, to the lot of wives of disabled veterans. Certainly, the events leading up to Bill C-40—which finally recognized the spouse of the disabled veteran who died while in receipt of a payment of less than 48 per cent—showed that, until that point, upon the death of the husband the spouse was cut off without a pension. In its wisdom, while patting itself on the back, the government introduced Bill C-40, which recognized the plight of those widows, indicating that since the cost was so exorbitant they would introduce it, under a graduated scheme, over a period of six and a half years.

It was the feeling of the committee that this was unfair and discriminated against widows because of their husband's rated disability. It was this inequity, along with others, which prompted our motion. Subsequently, as a result of pressure during our committee proceedings, the then Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable J. Gilles Lamontagne, said the following in his evidence of March 31:

As I mentioned, I realized very quickly that in Bill C-40 there were some discrepancies, and that was one of them. I felt there was an injustice to some of the widows who, as some people said, would die before they received any benefits from it. I told the Department of Veterans Affairs when I arrived that this is one thing they should look at right away—to evaluate the cost and see how we can do it. This has been done and it is in the finishing stages. I do not think I can be indiscreet in front of senators because they always know everything sooner or later, but we already set a date for the hearings—

Subsequently, the minister took as his objective the paying of these pensions immediately, rather than having them phased in over a period of six years. As honourable senators know, that obligation was fulfilled and resulted in the introduction of Bill C-82, which disposed of the phasing-in period, for which we are grateful.

Unfortunately, the minister and his government ignored or neglected again to recognize the further steps which should have been included in the bill—the long-standing recommendation of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, of the Royal Canadian Legion, of our committee and other organizations, that the pension be paid to the widow in double proportion to the assessed degree of pensioner's disability for those veterans who are in receipt of a pension of less than 48 per cent. It would have been fairer in recognizing the widow after the husband's death.

One of the most serious anomalies that exists within the charter concerns the wide variations in the schedules of rates for the disability pensioner and the war veterans allowance recipient with regard to the related benefits and the dependants' benefits.

Let us look at the widow of the deceased veteran who was entitled to the maximum widow's pension when her husband was receiving 50 per cent or more, and that amount was $608.60. To become entitled to that amount the widow's husband had to be receiving 50 per cent, and in this instance the two of them had to be receiving a pension of $507.16. So, on the veteran's death that widow was entitled to $608.60, or $101.44 more than she was receiving together with her husband. Indeed, the widow would receive after his death the same amount as a veteran and his wife are receiving from their disability pension of 60 per cent. Somebody in the Department of Veterans Affairs must have seen that a widow, whose pensioned husband had been getting 50 per cent, needed $101.44 more at present rates. This was only fair.

However, if we take the veteran who is in receipt of the maximum pension of 100 per cent and he and his wife are receiving $1,014 per month, upon his death his wife's pension, after the first month following his death, is reduced to $608.60, or $405 less. So, again, those experts in the department, in their wisdom, must have felt that that widow, who with her husband had been getting $1,014 a month, upon the death of the husband only needed $608. I grant that as a widow she does not need any more than another widow, but certainly, by all that is decent, she should be allowed a period of adjustment of more than a couple of weeks or a month, as the regulation states.

The discrepancy is more glaring in the case cited by Mr. Chadderton. In that case a veteran may, in addition to his 100 per cent disability pension, be in receipt of exceptional incapacity allowance and attendance allowance which, with his wife's portion, would amount to over $1,400. After the death of such a veteran, for some reason or other, the widow drops, after one month, to $608, or a difference of $800. I wonder how those wise people in the Department of Veterans Affairs could ever recognize that this was fair.

This is not a new problem; it has existed since 1968. Here is what the Woods committee recommended and what the National Council of Veterans Associations said about this matter in 1968, 13 years ago:

The existing provision to the effect that, on the death of a pensioner, pension and attendance allowance shall cease on the first day of the month following the death, represents another serious defect in Canada's pension legislation. This has been a subject of much concern to veteran organizations for a number of years and we are pleased to note the recommendations of the Woods committee to the effect that the widow would continue to receive pension at the married rate for one year, and attendance allowance for two months.

This matter had been a subject of much concern to veterans' organizations for a number of years preceding 1968. We are pleased to note the recommendations of the Woods committee, to the effect that the widow should continue to receive the pension at the married rate for one year following, and the attendance allowance for two months following, the death of her husband. This was the same national council as appeared before our committee and which, for years and years, asked for recognition of the widow. They concluded their remarks by saying:

It seems neither reasonable nor humane to reduce the pension income without giving her an opportunity to re-arrange her finances to meet the new circumstances.

They singled out those two recommendations to emphasize the inadequacy of the legislation in an area which, at the time, warranted the fullest possible sympathy and consideration—that is, the care of a pensioner's widow immediately following her husband's death.

The other serious anomaly is the variation between the allowances under the WVA, CWA and the Pension Act. There is a gap there which is getting out of proportion. Let me explain the War Veterans Allowance Act, which was introduced in 1930. It grants allowances to veterans and their families, based on an income test, that are paid because of age or incapacity or because the veteran is unable to work or has insufficient financial resources. It is a good act. Whoever introduced this act, regardless of party stripe, deserves full marks. At the present time, under the War Veterans Allowance Act the veteran is entitled to an allowance of $752.30 a month at the married rate. I do not know whether that figure is above or below the poverty line, but by today's standards it seems reasonable, though, it is probably below the poverty line and should be improved.

However, those receiving disability pension for a wound or a disability caused during war, battle or while in service receive a pension on a graduated scale of between 5 and 100 per cent, depending on the degree of disability under present rates. So the veterans' allowance recipient now receives almost the equivalent of a disability pensioner at 75 per cent, and certainly the disability pensioner is disabled because of a serious wound or condition. Furthermore, the WVA recipient is entitled to all drugs, while the disability pensioner is only entitled to drugs related to his condition. These provisions are all outdated. Some disability pensioner may be suffering from a new physical condition which is a direct result of his wound, and yet he will not receive the drugs.

The widow of the war veterans allowance recipient is protected after his death for 12 months, during which period she receives the sum of $752.30. She then receives the single rate of $446.09 for life, which sum is increased every three months. Not only is she protected, but she receives $150 more than the disability pensioner who is receiving the full widow's pension, and more than the widow of the 100-per-cent disability pensioner who is receiving, together with her husband, over $1,000 per month, which, after the death of the disabled pensioner, is reduced almost immediately to $608.

While everyone is concerned and is appreciative of the benefits to the war veterans allowance recipient and his wife, is it not complete hypocrisy for the government to deny the widow of the veteran with complete disablement the same recognition of adjustment as the widow whose husband had the lesser degree of disablement?

Once upon a time veterans were employed in the department to look after veterans' affairs, and I am wondering whether the new management-by-objectives system gives the same recognition to the service of World War I and World War II veterans and those who served in Korea.

Honourable senators, I now turn to the problem of the delays in the processing of pension applications, which is commonly referred to as the "backlog." This is certainly not a new problem, since it has persisted over the past 10 years or more. The creation of the backlog came about, first, as a result of the Woods committee report. That committee was commissioned by the then minister in 1965 to survey the organization and work of the Pension Commission.

In short, one of that committee's recommendations gave to every veteran who had previously applied for a pension and had been turned down, the right to re-apply. He was able to re-apply as many times as he wanted to, provided he could produce new evidence. Naturally, this resulted in thousands of renewed applications and a heavy burden on the commission. Therefore, it followed that a build-up of unattended applications would occur, and it did.

I say again that the problem is not a new one. It has been the subject of countless questions, representations and debates over the past 10 years in and out of Parliament. Even before the Woods committee report, which recommended the new process, this problem existed.

I could quote the many questions which have been asked in the other place and in this chamber regarding this matter, but instead I would refer to a document which my party produced prior to the 1974 election. By doing so, I am in no way bragging that my party recommended a correction; I do so only because this subject was documented at that time. In March 1974 the following appeared in the PC policy paper:

We would take immediate steps to provide administrative and support assistance to the Canadian Pension Commission, the Pensions Review Board, and the Bureau of Pensions Advocates. This would be done by decentralizing the Pension Commission and strengthening district offices with regional commissioners, medical and administrative support staff. We would also, in consultation with veterans' organizations, review the present procedures in order to speed up adjudication.

Honourable senators, this was stated seven years ago, but nobody listened.

I would also put on the record a letter I received from the chairman of the Pension Commission, Mr. Allan O. Solomon, who recently retired but who is retained on an advisory basis. I received this letter in reply to my letter of November 23, 1979, when I complained about the length of time it took to process applications. The letter reads as follows:

Please refer to your letter of 23 November in which you commented on the matter-of-fact way in which "time" is treated. Problems relating to time are always a matter of concern. As you know, a considerable amount of investigation and work must be done with respect to every application for pension, whether it is at the First Decision level or Entitlement Board level. Depending on the volume in front of us at any given time, the availability of experienced personnel to deal with the applications and the research needed, the claims may be dealt with at the first level from three months to as much as 15 months. The average length of time is currently about 6½ months although there were times when it was less and earlier times when it was much more.

I understand that, under present conditions, 6½ months is a very short period of time. However, this was the situation on December 3, 1979. The letter goes on to state:

Similarly with the preparation of Statements of Case. The law requires that each such statement contain all the evidence relating to the case that is available on our files, the citation of all legislation relevant to the claim, the Commission's interpretation of the law relevant to the case, including any policy applicable to it, and a medical precis of the case including any medical opinion expressed thereon by any medical practitioner whose opinion was sought by the Commission. It now takes us some six months to prepare the average required statement. At one time it took as much as 18 months to prepare a Statement of Case. That time was eventually reduced to about four months a year ago, but has crept up to six months. I would hope that before long we will be able to effectively reduce the preparation time once again.

[Senator Marshall.]

I may be boring some honourable senators, but I should like to build up a case to show that many things caused the delays in the adjudication of pensions, of which I will speak a little later.

At this point I would indicate what the National Council of Veterans Associations said about the Pension Commission, which was getting all the blame. In a brief, the association said:

It would be difficult to be critical of the Canadian Pension Commission, having regard for first-hand knowledge of the achievements of the Government Agency, which arose out of the major amendments to the Pension Act recommended by the Committee to Study the Work and Organization of the Canadian Pension Commission (the WOODS Committee). These amendments created an almost inhuman work load.

In the main, the complaints from the member-associations have concerned the delays in adjudication. It has been the consistent viewpoint of National Council that this situation has been created primarily by the heavy influx of new applications and new appeals. It is understandable that there should be a rather heavy turnover in Commissioners, and in this respect it is our view that the Chairman has, through effective management, gotten the highest performance possible, from this group. From our certain knowledge, the problems have been created at the staff level and this may well have several causes—

Honourable senators, the companion agency of the Pension Commission, the Pension Review Board, indicated in March of this year that, as a result of improvements in the staffing of the Pension Review Board, the adjudication of pensions and the processing of applications were now proceeding on a reasonable basis and would be for some time after the changes in the legislation which had caused many of the delays.

We should keep in mind that, as a result of the Woods committee recommendations, new legislation such as the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, and the operation "service" of the Legion, thousands of new applications were received. The introduction of the provisions of Bill C-82, concerning the proportion of pensions for widows, will also encourage many more applications and ensure that more criticism will be aimed at the Pension Commission. We must also bear in mind that the relocation of the department to Prince Edward Island will certainly slow down the processing of claims.

This evidence indicates that the problems arose as a result of changes in policy and the systems laid down. The action being taken to correct the problem is not as a result of the sensational W5 program which appeared on television a couple of months ago; it was brought about by the persistence of veterans' organizations and interested MPs and senators. Certainly, the inquiry by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science did not hurt the cause. It probably helped the cause because of our proceedings, and the witnesses we heard.

I do not absolve the government of blame either. I feel that they should never be forgiven for failing to act sooner on the advice of interested parties. I refer to the Statements of Case. This only means that the government needs more clerks and typists to type up the case. There is the "benefit of doubt" clause, which was never interpreted flexibly, and the evidence which had to be sought because a veteran who applied for a pension could not give evidence and had to find a buddy to verify his story.

There is a clause in the Pension Act which gives the veteran the benefit of the doubt if the evidence is uncertain, but it certainly has not been recognized. It would appear that, as a result of the efforts of the committee, this situation will improve.

Another recommendation put forward by the committee has to do with the basic rate of pension. Veterans' organizations would, if this recommendation were accepted, no longer have to go through the agony every three or four years of begging the government to increase pensions to the level of parity with the composite group in the Public Service. At the moment, the Pension Act provides for escalation based on the Consumer Price Index. This does not represent an actual increase but merely keeps the purchasing power in line year after year. Secondly, the approach of veterans' associations is one of principle—that is, that the pensioner should be entitled to an annual escalation based on either the Consumer Price Index or wages for the composite group of the Public Service, whichever is greater. This particular recommendation could be adopted and put into effect on January 1, 1982 at no increase in cost to the government, because the wages for that composite group are, in fact, some $540 less than the amount paid a new pensioner. However, with new collective bargaining starting for the Public Service, the need for entrenching this in the legislation is even greater.

Under the War Veterans Allowance Act, it seems ridiculous at this stage that a veteran, who happened to leave the country to live in England or in the United States for health purposes, is required to return to Canada to qualify for his pension. He must reside in Canada for 365 days, even though as soon as he comes back he is entitled to receive that allowance.

I have received a letter dated October 14 from a fellow who has just had a heart bypass operation. He cannot work now, and wants to know whether he is entitled to a war veterans allowance. In order to qualify, he must move from New York to Canada. As soon as he gets here he can start collecting his war veterans allowance, but in order to be with his family he will have to bring them with him to Canada at great cost.

I shall not be much longer, honourable senators, but I now wish to deal with the final recommendation of the committee. In our discussions with the minister, it was recommended that because there are still many anomalies and inequities in the act, a committee should be set up to review the inequities which I mentioned, and which Senator Bonnell mentioned. These have to be dealt with. There is no reason why our committee could not continue to deal with those matters on the advice of people such as Mr. Chadderton and Mr. Solomon.

Finally, after 40 or 50 years, we should have legislation that should have been perfected 10 or 15 years ago, and we could then repay our commitment to our veterans.

After reading the committee's report, I received a letter from someone who stated:

This has reference to my comments regarding the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "They Served—We Care."

I think this title will become a classic. We have reached the point in time when the World War II veterans are having to leave their work in Veterans Affairs.

The task will be taken on by younger staff and I believe the average age of the departmental people now must be somewhere about 30 or 35. If they latch on to this slogan—They Served—We Care—it will be extremely helpful.

I think it is up to us to ensure that this is so, to ensure that the work goes on in the Department of Veterans Affairs, and, to ensure that the veteran is cared for—the veteran who is now between 60 and 100 years old.

A journalist working for the Globe and Mail a few years ago, in a column entitled "Let's Abolish a Few", stated that the Commonwealth National War Graves Commission in the Department of Veterans Affairs should be abolished. I do not know how old that fellow was, but if he had gone to Europe to see the money spent on the war graves located in Europe, the graves of lads who were only 17 or 18 years of age, the same age as he probably was, perhaps he would change his mind. He wants to deny care to those graves, the graves of those who sacrificed their lives for Canada. He also wants to abolish the Army Benevolent Fund, which looks after the poor and indigent who cannot qualify for any other benefit. He wants to eliminate the Pension Review Board, which we are dealing with right now, which must ensure that the veterans are cared for and that their applications for pensions are looked after.

This is the type of thing we must guard against. We must ensure that Canada fulfills its commitment to her veterans for as long as they live.

On motion of Senator Bird, debate adjourned.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL SESSION, MUNICH, WEST GERMANY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, October 22, 1981:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-seventh Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Munich, Federal Republic of Germany, from 11th to 16th October, 1981, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, from October 11 to 16, 1981, I had the privilege of representing the Government of Canada at the Twenty-seventh Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly at Munich in the Federal Republic of Germany. At this annual session, Mr. Leonard D. Hopkins, M.P. headed the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association delegation, and also did an excellent job of co-ordinating the work of the committee and assigning us to specific committees to ensure that the Canadian Branch of the North Atlantic Assembly was represented at all committee meetings.

During the meetings, the following committees were set up: Economic Committee, Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information, Military Committee, Political Committee, and a Scientific and Technical Committee. I had the honour to represent the Senate on the Scientific and Technical Committee. The House of Commons was represented by Mr. Ian Watson, M.P., who was the general rapporteur; Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre, the special rapporteur on Energy Alternatives, prepared by the Special House of Commons Committee on Alternative Energy and Oil Substitution; and the Honourable Alvin Hamilton, M.P.

Since other members of the delegation will likely speak concerning their specific committee, I will confine my remarks to the Scientific and Technical Committee.

On this committee we discussed such topics as Alliance energy problems, update on transfrontier air pollution and microwave radiation, the work of NATO's Science Committee and of NATO's Committee on the Challenges of Modern Society (CCMS), and the future prospects for the space shuttle and other space activities. I will restrict my remarks mostly to the space shuttle and its importance to the alliance and future science technology.

• (1530)

As you are well aware, a new era in space was heralded by the successful launch on April 12, 1981 of the world's first manned reusable space transport system—the space shuttle—which promises a revolution in the exploration and use of space.

The shuttle is a spacecraft with vast potential. Its extreme versatility offers enormous possibilities for novel and wide-ranging scientific, industrial and military applications in space.

It is anticipated that within 10 to 15 years a regular shuttle commuting service will be operating between earth and space and, as well as launching, repairing, retrieving, refurbishing and realigning all kinds of satellites in space, it will carry the building materials for constructing permanent space stations for living and working in space for many conjectured purposes, including, possibly, the erection of satellite solar power stations which would trap the energy from the sun and beam it to earth as microwaves for conversion to electricity.

The space shuttle also offers in-space experimental facilities for laboratories and perhaps small automated factories where industry could use the microgravity environment of space to manufacture pharmaceuticals, metals and crystals of almost perfect purity. There are also plans for the placing in orbit and servicing of a giant unmanned optical telescope capable of viewing light from sources up to 14,000 million light years away and expanding the known volume of the universe 350 times.

Above all, however, it is the military significance of the shuttle that is important. About 40 per cent of the shuttle missions up to 1987 will carry military payloads and, in the longer term, the American Department of Defense share of the total cost of shuttle missions will be about one-third. The American Department of Defense is planning to spend over $500 million on shuttle research and development in 1982.

A further major feature of the shuttle is its apparent economy as a launch vehicle based on plans to reuse each orbiter vehicle for 100 missions, and so avoid the prohibitive capital costs of expendable rocket launchers.

As far as comparative launch costs are concerned, a single payload on the currently used Delta 3914 rocket with its 5,733 pounds of lifting capacity costs $22 million, rising to $25 million from 1982. The European Space Agency Ariane launcher, with a 10,580 pounds of payload lifting capacity, costs between $25 million and $50 million, depending on whether one or two payloads are launched on a single flight. The cost of an entire payload, however, in the space shuttle with its vast 65,000 pounds of cargo carrying capability, is expected to be about $35 million in 1982.

These figures, comparing launch costs and payload lifting capability, show a considerable cost advantage in favour of the shuttle. The significance of this can be realized from the fact that the satellite launch market is estimated to be worth about $5 billion over the next nine years.

It is hoped that the shuttle will eventually be able to reduce the overall average payload cost to about $300 per pound. This figure, however, currently depends on an average of at least 25 flights per year.

Plans are now under way to have 34 shuttle launches between now and 1985. You might well ask: What is the application of the space shuttle and what benefit will it be to scientific and industrial development?

During the 1990s, when the shuttle will be commuting between earth and space on a regular weekly basis using four solid rocket boosters to carry very heavy payloads—up to 100,000 pounds—it is considered feasible that astronaut crews and equipment will be carried into orbit to build and maintain large orbiting communication satellites, solar power stations and automated factories where industry will use the environment of space to make things that are difficult or impossible to make on earth.

Space is free from vibration, provides a near perfect vacuum and is, of course, gravity-free. This condition of weightlessness or microgravity means that convection currents do not exist so that neither low density nor heat causes warmer, or less dense materials to rise or flow; on the other hand, cooler or denser materials will not sink. Therefore, it is much easier to separate the different parts of a liquid, and keep them separated, in space than on the earth. This means that pharmaceutical substances such as drugs, vaccines, hormones and enzymes of almost perfect purity could be manufactured in space.

This purity factor is very important in the preparation of antibiotics whose adverse side effects are usually due to impurities. An important example of this is the possible preparation of an anticoagulant drug made from urokinase—an enzyme produced by about 5 per cent of the kidney cells—which dissolves clots in the blood almost immediately, and is of immense medical value to treat victims of heart attacks, strokes and vein inflammations.

On earth it is very difficult to extract the enzyme-producing cells from the kidney tissues. In space, however, the cells in a liquid suspension with other kidney cells can be isolated by electrophoresis, which entails passing an electric current through the cells and separating them according to their electrical properties. Another similar application could be used for isolating beta cells, which control the body's absorption of insulin, from the pancreas. A pure concentration implanted into a diabetic could possibly enable the sufferer to generate and use his own insulin.

The absence of convection and sedimentation in space also allows a process which is the opposite of obtaining pure substances by separation. It makes possible the mixing of molten or powdered metals with widely differing densities such as aluminum and lead. Thus, new alloys of materials which, on earth, would separate in melted or sintered form can be prepared in space. It has been estimated that up to 400 completely new alloys could be produced by orbiting space foundries.

Pure metals, also, can be melted and cooled without the influence of gravity. As their atoms and molecules would tend to line up with more perfect regularity, this would mean structurally stronger metals and steel magnets six times more powerful than any now known to man.

Superior semiconductors may also be possible by space manufacture, in stabilized conditions, of larger and more perfect crystals than is possible on earth. A ten-fold increase in quality is expected to result from microchips grown in orbit.

The problem of making pure glass on earth is that the mold or container often contaminates the glass which is being produced. In space, however, glass can be melted and solidified while hovering, and need not come into contact with any surrounding surface. This means that glass of ultrapure quality can be produced for high technology optical systems, including lasers.

The industrialization of space resulting from the successful preparation of pharmaceuticals and materials processing will be enhanced by initial research undertaken in complete scientific laboratories carried aboard the space shuttle.

The ninth or tenth mission of the shuttle, scheduled for June 1983, will include the first of these so-called space laboratories which is a manned orbital laboratory designed to fit precisely into the payload cargo bay of the orbiter vehicle and to perform wide-ranging scientific, industrial and technological research in the low-gravity, high-vacuum environment of space.

Spacelab missions will comprise mainly intensive, short duration experiments, aimed at complementing the long-term observation programs of orbiting satellites, and will include studies of the sun and solar wind, comets and high energy radiation from distant regions of the universe; measurements of the earth's electromagnetic environment and upper atmosphere experiments in space; experiments in space processing of industrial and biomedical products; studies of the effect that conditions in space have on humans, plants, animals and cells; and the testing and calibration of sensors which will be used in earth-survey satellites.

In 1984 or early 1985 a space telescope will be launched—the most powerful telescope ever built and one of the few genuinely scientific applications of the space shuttle program.

The space telescope is an unmanned, multipurpose, optical telescope observatory which, from an orbit height of 312 miles, will get sharper images by avoiding the distortions caused by the earth's atmosphere experiments in space, including shifting air currents, stray light and the airglow—all of which limit the capabilities of earth-bound telescopes.

The space telescope will be capable of seeing objects 50 times fainter than ground-based telescopes, and it will also look farther into space and therefore in time—14,000 million light years as opposed to the 2,000 million light years possible from earth.

It will be used to search for planets orbiting stars other than the sun, to view the early stages of star and solar system formation and many other astronomical applications, including offering more precise information on the origin of the universe.

The space telescope will cost about $750 million to construct and it will be under remote control from the Goddard Space Flight Center, Maryland, U.S.A. It has a design life of 15 years and will weigh 24,000 lbs., with a length of 43 feet and a diameter of 14 feet.

The main mirror of the telescope is 94 inches in diameter and 13 inches thick. The pointing and stabilization control system can point the telescope to an accuracy of 0.01 arc second or 1/36,000 degrees and can hold a target for extended periods within 0.07 arc second.

One of the most widely discussed applications of the shuttle has been in assisting in the assembly and construction of an orbiting satellite solar power station which, unhindered by bad weather or limited sunlight, could generate a steady stream of energy from space to earth.

This space structure would transmit microwaves from orbit to a ground receiving station which would convert the microwaves to electrical energy and be capable of generating 5 million Kw. of power.

It is estimated that the power generation costs could be halved by using solar power stations, but it is felt that "effects such as microwave radiation will continue to require study."

A shuttle application foreseen for the 1990's is the public service platform, which is a communication system orbiting the earth and consisting of a group of high-powered antennae and transmitters for radio, television and data processing, each operating on a different frequency but sharing the same control system.

The advantage of the public service platform is that it would reverse the present position, in that equipment on the ground need only be small and simple, whereas the bulky broadcasting and relaying equipment would be in orbit.

People could then have wrist radios and could communicate with one another all over the world via the public service platform. Other applications could include wrist television, an electronic global mail service, holograph transmissions and disaster warning and search and information services. The public service platform would probably be carried in parts by the shuttle for assembly and then lifted into high orbit for operation.

It is also planned to launch interplanetary spacecraft. One such mission is the Galileo Jupiter orbiter/probe planned for shuttle launch in 1985, which will send a probe to study the atmosphere experiments in space of Jupiter by dropping a capsule to a level where the pressure is 10 times greater than on earth. Information from the capsule will be relayed to the mother spacecraft which will orbit the planet for about 20 months observing the higher atmosphere experiments in space of Jupiter.

Military interest in space has increased rapidly in recent years and earth orbit is rapidly becoming another theatre for routine military operations where both super powers are putting more and more military devices on to satellites each year.

These devices are currently used for intelligence—that is, the location of troops, missiles, industrial and military targets; arms control verification; interception of radio messages and radar emissions; prediction of weather—planning for offensive and defensive operations; navigation—to allow surface ships, submarines and aeroplanes to determine their precise positions; early warning of enemy missile attack and communication.

An enhanced future military use of space has been widely predicted, including space defence, anti-satellite devices and space laser weapons, and any future war between the super powers might well be decided by which side makes the best use of its space war fighting capabilities.

The Soviet Union spends at least twice as much on its military activities in space as it does on its civilian activities. In 1980, for example, while the United States was launching 12 satellites, the Soviet Union made 89 launchings, of which 81 were for military purposes, and three of these launchings each placed eight satellites in orbit for communications purposes.

This compares with a total of 74 military satellites launched in 1979. Up to the end of 1976 Soviet military satellite launchings had exceeded United States efforts by almost 50 per cent, mainly due to the preponderance of photographic reconnaissance and communications satellites. On the other hand, the United States had launched more early warning and geodetic satellites. The significance of early warning has been accepted by the Soviet Union, and in 1980 they launched five satellites, the highest yearly launch total for this purpose.

The military use of space is, in fact, proscribed by the 1967 Outer Space Treaty signed by the United States, the Soviet Union and over 70 other countries. The treaty declares outer space, including the moon and other planets, a zone of peace.

The shuttle appears about to give the United States an overall strategic military advantage over the Soviet Union. An estimate prepared by the Rockwell Corporation considers that within four to five years the United States could deploy a partial space defence system based on technology developed for the shuttle, together with high-energy laser weapons. There is no doubt that the shuttle opens up considerable opportunities for military exploitation of space.

The space shuttle has the ability to place in orbit, more economically and more efficiently, satellites of all kinds, including reconnaissance and early warning, communications, meteorological and navigation satellites.

Its huge payload capacity, manoeuvrability and capability make the shuttle an ideal launch vehicle for very large, sophisticated and complex satellites.

The U.S. Department of Defense intends to replace the highly sensitive "Big Bird" reconnaissance satellites, which have been operational since 1971, with heavier, shuttle-launched satellites which can be returned intact to earth and re-used.

A new type of early warning aircraft detection satellite—the "Teal Ruby" space infra-red sensor system—is due for shuttle launch in 1983. This system is a single axis scanning radiometer with 95 detector elements arranged in 12 linear arrays, with each array sensitive to a different part of the electromagnetic spectrum. The "Teal Ruby" will eventually replace or augment ground based surveillance systems currently in use.

Also being prepared for shuttle launch in 1983 is a laser communications measurement unit in space called "Lasercom" which is a satellite-to-satellite, or satellite-to-aircraft, communications link with high data rate transmission, increased transmission security and greater jam resistance.

The U.S. Navy's transit navigational satellite system is due for early replacement by the shuttle which will provide worldwide navigational information to aircraft, ships, ground vehicles and personnel, with position accuracy of about 30 feet and speed accuracy of one-tenth of a mile per hour. Receivers will be installed in tactical aircraft, bombers and fighters, submarines, missile systems, (ICBM's, SLBM's), ground vehicles, and carried by individual troops in backpacks. The NAVSTAR system will also help to improve the accuracy of artillery and night bombing.

The shuttle will also be used to launch into space 12 communications satellites to replace those in the defence satellite communications system which provides world-wide communications for fixed ground stations.

Satellites can be lifted out of, or hauled into, the cargo payload bay of the orbiter by a remotely controlled manipulator arm system. The manoeuvrability of the orbiter allows it to get close enough to an enemy satellite to allow the manipulator arm to retrieve the satellite for inspection, dismantling, immobilization or destruction.

The same capability allows the shuttle to retrieve damaged or faulty "friendly" satellites, either for return to earth in the cargo bay or for repair and reprogramming in space.

The feasibility of in-space satellite repair may well be tested on the next flight of the shuttle. Apparently, the Solar Maximum Mission, launched in February 1980 to study solar flares during the peak in the current 11-year cycle of solar activity, has lost its ability to point accurately at the sun because of a simple fuse failure in the attitude control module.

The Solar Maximum Mission is, in fact, the first satellite to use a "multimission spacecraft bus" with subsystem modules specifically designed to be replaced in space in the shuttle's open cargo bay unit by shuttle crews.

If this project is undertaken, the operation will probably entail the shuttle rendezvousing with Solar Maximum in the spacecraft's anticipated orbit of approximately 300 miles. The shuttle's remote manipulator arm would attach to the grapple connector built into the satellite and lift Solar Maximum onto the flight support system of the shuttle, where either the remote manipulator arm or an astronaut on a spacewalk, or a combination of both, would remove the faulty module, replace it with a new one, check the system and finally return the Solar Maximum satellite to orbit again using the manipulator arm.

Honourable senators, the capabilities and the scientific possibilities of the space shuttle are enormous. In light of the fact that the Soviet Union, which invests about $100 million annually in X-ray and gamma ray laser research, may be significantly ahead of the United States in directed energy weapon development for ballistic missile defence and, following the announcement in March 1981, that they had successfully tested a killer satellite, possibly using a laser homing device, much attention has been focussed on the space shuttle's future role in space warfare using laser systems.

Realizing that the space shuttle is again making a mission to the orbiter in the next few days, I believe that it would be to the advantage of the Canadian government and Parliament to send one or more representatives from the science committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to view the shuttle take-off, to see first hand the tremendous scientific and research capabilities for the future advancement of science and the increasing military use of the space shuttle and orbiter for the protection or destruction of mankind.

Honourable senators, I would like to spend more time telling you of further research and development in microbiology, molecular manipulation, the dangers of microwave emitting products and the dangers of long-term occupational exposure to low levels of microwave radiation. There are studies taking place today in France on lighter-than-air aircraft, and in the United Kingdom concerning contaminated land. There are studies on air pollution control strategies being carried out by the Federal Republic of Germany, a study in Canada concerning man's impact on the stratosphere experiments in space, and many other such interesting studies around the world.

I think it is a necessity that we, as parliamentarians, take part in these discussions and studies and be able to report back to our respective parliaments on the great advances in science and communications technology, genetic manipulation and space technology.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask Senator Bonnell a question.

Before doing so, I would like to congratulate Senator Bonnell on a fascinating, detailed and erudite explanation of the "Star Wars" era that we are moving towards.

I was interested in your reference to the fact that satellites were being used for intelligence, and also for military purposes. You mentioned that there had been 89 launchings by the Soviet Union, and I was wondering whether there was any evidence that the Soviet Union is arming these satellites with missiles. Secondly, you mentioned that at the end of a four-year period the United States would have X-ray weapons—laser and gamma—and you referred to an aerospace treaty involving over 70 countries. I did not completely catch what you said, but I think you said that the basis of the treaty was that space would be used for peaceful purposes. Does it, however, actually outlaw the use of destructive weapons based on satellites?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, no, I do not think that that treaty outlaws the use of laser beams, and so forth, in space; but it is an agreement among those 70 countries, including the United States and the Soviet Union, that declares outer space a zone of peace. I think the treaty is really outdated in the light of the technology we have today, and some consideration should be given by parliamentarians across the world to expand the treaty and make it even more tightly protective of the peoples of the world who might very well be destroyed. I do not really think that the treaty as it is today is strong enough to stop the use of such things as laser beams in outer space. It is, however, strong enough that there should not be a war in outer space.

Senator Thompson: May I ask if there was any discussion on whether there was evidence of the Soviet Union actually arming satellites with missiles?

Senator Bonnell: There was some discussion but, as you know, it is difficult for the western world to find out just what the eastern world is doing. There seems to be an Iron Curtain there. We anticipate that they are doing a lot of things. They are certainly spending a lot of money and are making a lot of missions into space. However, they must use different rockets in each mission. They do not have a shuttle which can be used over and over again. It is our feeling that the western world will probably advance more quickly than the eastern world because of the economics of using the same shuttle repeatedly.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of this debate on the understanding that I shall definitely speak tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 29, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until next Tuesday, November 3, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we could hardly have refused permission to proceed with this motion, considering the substantial number of measures that are before the Senate—very urgent ones, there is no doubt about that. However, for the record, I should appreciate it if the Acting Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Langlois—we are very pleased to see he has resumed his former duties—would tell us why it is so urgent for us to sit next week?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his words of welcome upon my resumption of my former duties, but I must add it is only temporary.

Regarding his question on the need for sitting next week, I should like to point out that it is necessary as a matter of principle and is also desirable that this Chamber should sit while the other Chamber is in session.

First of all, there is a possibility that tomorrow, in the other place, they will be considering Bill C-48 and three other non-controversial bills; I believe that there is ample justification for our presence in this Chamber next week.

Senator Flynn: In any event, Senator Langlois' words are supported by the fact that we see so many ministers here today.

● (1410)

[English]

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, for what reason does the acting deputy leader believe the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will have completed its study of the subject matter of Bill C-48 by the time he suggested? Has he had any indication of that kind from the chairman of that committee?

[Translation]

Senator Langlois: I shall answer my colleague, Senator Murray, that in politics, optimism is the secret of success; in fact, that is why we are always on this side of this Chamber!

Senator Murray: The Acting Leader of the Government knows perfectly well that the Senate has given this committee a sufficiently broad mandate to cover the entire energy policy of the Canadian government. Now, I find it very strange that the government expects the committee to finish this very important business within a few weeks.

Senator Langlois: In any case, as I said earlier, honourable senators, Bill C-48 is not the only bill to be considered tomorrow in the other house. There are three other non-controversial bills which may also be attended to in the other place, and I feel these three bills are sufficient reason for us to return to the Senate next week.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would also add that next week could well be a very historic week on Parliament Hill in light of the scheduled constitutional discussions involving the First Ministers. It seems to me that every parliamentarian would wish to be present in this city during the time of those discussions.

Senator Flynn: On the contrary, I believe that we should all be away so as not to impair the possibility of a compromise and so as not to provoke the Prime Minister's instinct for provocation and confrontation.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): We on this side would be helpful.

Senator Flynn: You do not need to be in this chamber to be helpful.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CABINET

SASKATCHEWAN—LOCAL OFFICES OF HON. HAZEN ARGUE, P.C.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to begin—perhaps I am continuing—in a light vein. I have in my hand a communiqué wherein the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board—and I am glad to see he is present—describes himself as the minister of the national government responsible for Saskatchewan.

An Hon. Senator: Is that what the order in council says?

Senator Flynn: I do not believe that it can be found in any order in council. The minister's official position has never really been made clear. In any event, he is a member of the cabinet, and that is the main problem, or, I should say, the main consideration.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I can agree with you on that.

Senator Flynn: I withdraw the word "problem". The problem is not for the people of Canada, but for the cabinet. In this communiqué the minister tells us that he has opened a new office in Saskatoon. He already has an office in Regina.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Prince Albert is next.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It is expensive for the taxpayer.

Senator Flynn: Could the minister tell us whether he appears at those two offices and, if so, at what times? If the minister wishes to be sure that all residents of Saskatchewan have equal access to the minister, then he himself should be there occasionally, rather than relying on his special assistant. I would like to know the minister's schedule, and I am sure that it would be very helpful to the people of Saskatchewan if they knew when to go to Saskatoon and when to go to Regina, or whether they should press on and perhaps go to an office in Prince Albert or another centre.

● (1415)

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I am very interested in the question posed by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. Senators work under great difficulty in representing their provinces—

Senator Flynn: You mean to say "ministers".

Senator Argue: No, I mean to say "senators".

Senator Flynn: I see.

Senator Argue:—because senators do not have the facilities available to them in their home provinces that are enjoyed by members of the other place. However, that is not the question put by the Leader of the Opposition.

Yes, I have an office located in Saskatoon and an office located in Regina. I have a special assistant working in each of those offices. Those offices are used to quite an extent by citizens of Saskatchewan who wish to make inquiries of the government on many subjects.

Just before I came into the chamber today, I had a call from my office in Regina saying that people had been into that office to ask certain questions about the Department of National Revenue. It is really a service that is there for the people of Saskatchewan. However, I am not in Saskatoon or Regina when I am in Ottawa.

I seem to be in Saskatchewan almost every weekend. I was in my office in Saskatoon, which is a Government of Canada office, last Friday and Saturday. I was in my office in Regina on Monday of this week, and I will be in my Saskatoon office again this weekend.

The hours are irregular and, in a sense, not satisfactory because I cannot be there as much as I should like to be, but almost every day I am in one of the three offices.

Senator Flynn: You have two offices in Saskatchewan and two in Ottawa. That makes four offices altogether.

Senator Argue: Well, not really.

Senator Flynn: Don't you have two in Ottawa?

Senator Argue: I do the best I can, and I am out in those offices some of the time. If there were more hours in the day, or more days in the week, I suppose I could be out there even more than I am.

Hon. R. James Balfour: May I ask a supplementary question of the minister? In light of his sympathetic attitude towards the difficulties his Senate colleagues from Saskatchewan operate under in terms of representing regional interests in the province, I should like to ask whether the honourable senator would be prepared to make available to me, for example, some space, telephone and secretarial facilities in his office in Regina so that I, too, may discharge my responsibilities to those in Saskatchewan who might prefer to consult with a senator from this side rather than a senator from the other side.

Senator Argue: I do not think I could encourage my honourable friend in that respect. I think it would really be unprecedented to have a member of the opposition party sitting in a minister's office.

I sympathize with the general request of the honourable senator, and I do think those kinds of facilities should be made available to members of the Senate. It is going a little too far to make available a minister's office, but I would be happy to make inquiries on office space, if my honourable friend is serious and wants office space in a government building in Saskatchewan for the purpose of performing his duty as a senator. As I have just said, I would be most happy to make inquiries to see if something can be done. It might create a good precedent if something could be done. I do not know if anything can be done, but I would like to promote that. I think it would help senators from both sides of the house if they had access to an office with telephone and secretarial facilities within their home provinces in carrying out their duties and responsibilities.

Hon. Jack Marshall: How about a sublet?

Senator Flynn: I suppose we should waive consideration until the government has decided on the budget cuts that were talked about in Toronto last night.

As a supplementary question, and not particularly addressed to the minister responsible for Saskatchewan but to the Leader of the Government—and, possibly, Senators Olson and Austin—is he satisfied that with only one office in Vancouver he can discharge his responsibilities to the people of British Columbia? Does he think he should have an office in Prince Rupert—

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Kamloops.

Senator Flynn: —Kamloops, or elsewhere? Perhaps Senator Austin, who is responsible for the Yukon, should have an office in Whitehorse or Yellowknife.

As far as Senator Olson is concerned, I think he has an office at Calgary airport, but what about Edmonton?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I have one there too.

Senator Flynn: What about Peace River? I would like to hear from all three ministers, according to seniority, of course, starting with Senator Perrault, then Senator Olson and, last but not least, Senator Austin.

Senator Argue: Don't go too far or we will not get to you.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Flynn, who is pursuing this line of questioning, perhaps nurtures the hope that he will be back in the ministry at some time in the future.

Senator Flynn: God forbid!

Senator Perrault: Perhaps he would like to know the terms and conditions of his employment.

Senator Flynn: I don't want to go back, for anything.

Senator Perrault: I was interested to note as well that he wanted to know when the office of our distinguished colleague, Senator Argue, opened in the morning and when it closed in the evening. Is he really asking for an appointment at the office in Saskatoon or in Regina?

Senator Flynn: I am asking a question to which I want a reply.

Senator Perrault: All the ministers would be pleased to arrange an appointment with the distinguished Leader of the Opposition at any time.

I have an office in Vancouver. I would point out that every province has different geographical features.

Senator Flynn: What about yours?

Senator Perrault: The population of Saskatchewan is distributed very evenly north and south.

Senator Flynn: But that is not so in British Columbia.

Senator Perrault: British Columbia is somewhat different.

Senator Flynn: Victoria.

Senator Perrault: Every minister who is a member of this chamber is earnestly striving to represent his province and the interests of the country as effectively as possible, and this requires different physical facilities.

Senator Flynn: In some cases, we would not need many offices in order to do our jobs properly.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, as Senator Argue is approaching this subject in a very agreeable manner, I should like to say right now that the logical place for my office would be at the Charlottetown airport. However, considering the slow pace of construction of that terminal, which has been delayed by about 10 years by this government, passengers being "cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd" every day, I would like him to look for another site for me.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

DELAY IN COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION—IMPACT ON NATIVE PEOPLES

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It's about time.

Senator Lucier: The deferral of the Norman Wells project on the northern pipeline was considered to be a good move both by the company and by the native peoples involved in the Northwest Territories. The native peoples would derive economic and other advantages from the building of the pipeline. However, since nearly 25 per cent of the two-year delay period has now expired and no action has yet been taken by the government, would the honourable minister tell us whether some moves have been made to start programs very quickly so that, when the delay is over, the native peoples of the Northwest Territories will be prepared to take advantage of the opportunities inherent in the building of that pipeline?

Hon. Jack Marshall: He is too busy opening up an office out there.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): I thank Senator Lucier for his question. I have now been able to participate with native peoples in discussions relative to the Norman Wells oil pipeline project and also in other discussions relative to the gas pipeline project that will go through the Yukon, the area Senator Lucier represents. I am satisfied that the time being spent now in focusing on the concerns of native peoples and also on environmental concerns is being well spent. I think that we have moved, in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, into what I would call the "post-Berger period." The focus of all people is on the optimum economic growth for their community within the context of optimum social and economic results.

● (1425)

With respect to the question relating to the awarding of funds for participation, I have no specific information, but I will seek it and advise Senator Lucier in due course.

Senator Flynn: Would the minister define for us the "post-Berger period"? Exactly what changes does that imply?

Senator Austin: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the opportunity to talk further on this subject. As honourable senators know, Mr. Justice Thomas Berger headed a royal commission inquiry—

Senator Flynn: I know that.

Senator Austin:—in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon with respect to gas pipelining down the Mackenzie River valley. What he found was much concern about pre-economic questions—questions of the impact on societies in those communities, particularly native societies, and the impact on the environment—which were not settled. Also, he outlined certain political circumstances in the Northwest Territories that he felt needed to be addressed before an economic decision with respect to pipelining could take place.

What I am saying to honourable senators, when I call the current circumstances the "post-Berger period", is that many of those social, political and economic conditions have been addressed in the intervening period, and all peoples in the Northwest Territories are now ready to deal with the question of economic growth in the context of the debate about social and political conditions which were laid out in the Berger report.

Senator Flynn: You mean that these worries really were non-existent?

Senator Austin: Just the opposite. I think that the worries raised by Mr. Justice Berger had reality in the minds of the people—

Senator Flynn: And now they have not?

Senator Austin:—and they have been working their way through those realities, and I believe there is some consensus now developing in the Northwest Territories which will allow economic growth to take place.

Senator Flynn: I think you mean exactly the same thing.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with regard to concerns of the people of Manitoba and others—I understand some of the members of the opposition are also concerned—about the Garrison project. We have been told many, many times that the Garrison is gone, that we do not have to worry about it. We seem to get that type of assurance from time to time.

I have before me an article from the Winnipeg Free Press dated Saturday, October 17, 1981, in which it is stated that a member of the Reagan administration says that that administration favours the diversion project. I could go on to read it, as some of the members of the opposition read various quotations yesterday, but it would be burdensome.

[Senator Austin.]

I have another article from the Winnipeg Free Press dated October 22, 1981, which states that Senator Quentin Burdick, a North Dakota Democrat, is again attempting in the Senate Appropriations Committee to have the sponsoring Interior Department directed to proceed with the project. We are really getting concerned because it certainly will pollute our fresh water in Manitoba.

But what intrigues me most is an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on Friday, October 23, 1981 under the headline "Garrison Project Funds Okayed"—that is, okayed by the Senate Appropriations Committee in Washington. I shall read just part of the first paragraph:

The Senate Appropriations Committee Thursday approved a $12.4 billion water and energy bill . . . including funds for the controversial Garrison.

My God! If that is the case, then I believe it is time someone made representations on our behalf to seek assurance that the project will not proceed without some discussion between the Manitoba and federal governments, and also that assurance will be sought that they will not spoil everything we have north of the American boundary—because that is exactly what it would do. At one time, an honourable senator suggested they would proceed with the project but would turn the water south. But that is questionable, because in one of the articles it is suggested they should explain how it would be done, because apparently no consultant or engineer has come up with a solution. Yet the funds exist; they have been given the money to carry on with the project.

I would therefore say to the government leader, with complete sincerity, that the people of Manitoba are concerned about the matter and feel that the government is not making appropriate representations to ensure, once and for all, that our fresh water interests will be safeguarded. I have not discussed the matter with the government leader, and perhaps my intervention today surprises him. At the same time, he should be aware that we in Manitoba are concerned about this urgent matter.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a few days ago I provided some information with respect to a statement attributed to a United States senator who is reported to have expressed his support for continuation of the Garrison project.

Despite vigorous Canadian protests which have been registered not only by our ambassador to the United States, Ambassador Towe, but also by provincial officials and others, the Senate Appropriations Committee, on October 21, approved a $4 million appropriation for the Garrison project and instructed the Department of the Interior to proceed with construction on the Garrison. It did, however, reiterate Congress's 1980 stipulation that none of the funds be used for construction on features affecting Canada.

Despite that assurance, concerns remain in this chamber and in the other place, and certainly throughout the country. We believe this instruction to be open to a legal challenge, because an appropriation act may not be an acceptable vehicle for such a substantive legislative initiative. The government, of course, is disappointed by this development. It is following the matter closely and will do everything in its power to ensure that Canadian interests are protected.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I believe the Leader of the Government is sincere in his reply, but, at the same time, will he discuss the matter with the Minister of External Affairs and the Minister of the Environment and ascertain what they intend to do about the matter. Possibly further information could be made available to the Senate. It might cool us down a little and enable us to reassure Manitobans that the government is doing everything possible to get the matter dealt with properly and is acting sincerely on their behalf. We need to obtain a positive answer once and for all.

Senator Perrault: As usual, the honourable senator has advanced a positive and constructive suggestion, and careful consideration will be accorded his proposal.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

NATIVE LAND CLAIMS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CABINET DISCUSSION PAPER

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin, the Minister of State. A cabinet discussion paper made public last month notes that settling native land claims could cost the government as much as $4.1 billion, in 1980 dollars, over the next 15 years.

Would the minister undertake to table that document in the Senate so that we may all be apprised of the federal basis for land claims negotiations with the native peoples?

● (1435)

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Does Senator Bielish say that the document was released by the Government of Canada, and is in public distribution?

Senator Bielish: It is a cabinet discussion paper.

Senator Austin: Where did you get that?

Senator Bielish: From the Globe and Mail.

Senator Austin: I assure honourable senators that I will look into the subject matter that has been raised by Senator Bielish and advise her.

INDIAN ACT—DISCRIMINATORY PROVISIONS

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, the new minister responsible for the status of women last week confirmed that the government will abide by its commitment to the United Nations to amend the Indian Act in order to remove discriminatory provisions. Would the minister indicate if the government will so act to amend the legislation simply by introducing the appropriate amendment, or if it is the government's intention to introduce those necessary and widely supported amendments as part of a package of amendments to the Indian Act, some of which are rumoured to include changes to municipal governments and are highly controversial within the native community?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): I will look into the options available to the government and report back.

Senator Bielish: Honourable senators, the minister responsible for the status of women said last week that the government would not act to compensate those who have been previously wronged by the discriminatory provisions of the Indian Act. Would the minister seek further explanation as to why this decision has been taken?

Senator Austin: I am not accepting the premise; but, excluding that premise, I certainly will look into the subject matter of Senator Bielish's questions, and respond.

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—NATURAL GAS BANK

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask some questions of the Minister of State for Economic Development in connection with the petroleum industry, and remind him, if he needs any reminding, that when the National Energy Program was brought down about this time last year—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is the first anniversary of it.

Senator Roblin: Yes. I saw some people yesterday wearing a flower in their buttonhole. I do not know whether it was in celebration or in mourning.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It depends on the flower.

Senator Roblin: In any event, we will leave that to one side. It depends on the flower? That is a pretty good answer. It also depends on the policy.

I would like to ask my honourable friend something about the Natural Gas Bank. He will probably recall that when the National Energy Program came down a Natural Gas Bank was proposed, to be funded in the amount of $400 million, and having as its purpose assisting small Canadian gas producers by buying and storing their product, if it was not marketable, by going into joint ventures with producers, and perhaps even by providing production loans. When was the Natural Gas Bank opened?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin is correct in that an announcement was made in the National Energy Program that was related to, or concurrent with, the announcement of the budget last year.

Of course, in this connection a number of matters had to be taken into account. One was the setting up of the criteria under which purchases could be made, giving some cash flow to the companies having gas requiring to be held for a longer period of time than would be the case if there was an immediate market for it.

A number of things have happened in the intervening period. Of course, my honourable friend will understand that much of the expenditure in the NEP was dependent on reaching an agreement, and I will not repeat those arguments because they are well known to my honourable friend. That did not happen until September of this year.

There were also very important hearings held during the course of the past year on the amount of gas reserves that we have in Canada, particularly in relation to the Canadian requirements for that gas over whatever projected length of time the National Energy Board had under consideration. I could check again, but I do not believe that any payments have been made to anyone for the cost of holding that gas, because there are obviously a number of complex regulations and, I might even add, criteria that have to be worked out with respect to the basis upon which those payments would be made.

Senator Roblin: In that case, honourable senators, what on earth did the Minister of Energy mean when speaking on Tuesday in Calgary? He said to his audience of petroleum people: "In addition, we stand ready to help out with our Natural Gas Bank to assist smaller producers with cash flow problems." He announced the policy a year ago. He referred to it two days ago. Yet, as far as I know, there is no information before the gas industry as to what this means to them. How can he offer to help them in this respect without telling them what the facts are in connection with it?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend can have it one way or the other. I do not want to identify the occasions, but he will recall that in a number of cases in the past he has complained about the consultation with the people affected—in this case, the gas industry—to the effect that the consultations have been inadequate in terms of working out a plan that will satisfactorily meet the problem that was described about a year ago. Those negotiations are still under way.

Senator Roblin: It does seem remarkable to me that it takes 12 months for the ministry to resolve this question. I ask the minister what price will be allowed for the gas that is taken over by the government in this connection to help the small companies with the cash-flow problem?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend knows that is one of the details that would come out of the discussions and negotiations. I hardly think that it is fair for him to say it is astounding—I believe he used that word—that it takes so long to make these kinds of arrangements. The government has a responsibility to see that it is done fairly and equitably to everyone involved. He knows very well how long it took to reach an energy agreement. It is not only the government presently in office that has had that problem, so I do not think he should be astounded by that factor.

Senator Roblin: Well, the present government certainly has the problem in spades. To that extent, I would agree with my honourable friend. I would also agree with him that it is necessary for the government to act in a prudent manner and to conduct its affairs properly. The National Energy Program, however, is a policy that affects the small gas producer in an immediate and direct way, as my honourable friend knows. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick." How can these people plan their businesses if they are relying on the Natural Gas Bank to help them out and they do not know what the policy of the government is?

Accepting the excuses, which is all they are, in my opinion, may I ask—

Senator Olson: They are explanations, not excuses.

Senator Roblin: I regard them as excuses, and I think I have the right to do so.

Senator Olson: I have the right to disagree.

Senator Roblin: If you cannot make up your mind over a 12-month period, it is typical, perhaps, of your performance. I want to ask my honourable friend this: Disregarding our disagreement about matters, can he give me a target date, at which time the information about the Natural Gas Bank will be available so that those who hope to take advantage of it will know what is in store for them?

Senator Olson: In reply, I will give this undertaking: I will refer that inquiry to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to see whether he believes he is in a position to give a proper target date. My honourable friend knows better than I that one should not predict when someone else is going to make up his mind or when negotiations are going to terminate in an agreement.

Senator Roblin: All that is true, but what did the minister say in Calgary? He said, "We stand ready." That is what he said: "We stand ready to help out." Where is this readiness? What is being done? What is the policy? He cannot stand up and tell these people who need assistance that he stands ready without telling them what he is going to do.

Senator Olson: I think it is an important declaration to say that you stand ready with $400 million to help that industry, if you can identify and then prescribe or design a set of rules or criteria under which it can be made operative.

Senator Roblin: That is all very well, but when you stand ready, you want some action. And that is exactly what we don't get.

AGRICULTURE

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION—INCREASE IN RETURN ON INVESTMENTS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I shall direct this question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. If he is unable to answer it, perhaps he would like to refer to it one of his colleagues who is more familiar with agriculture than is the Leader of the Government.

The Minister of Agriculture has been making statements to the effect that the banks and financial institutions are making increased profits from farm loans. This morning I received a copy of the Public Accounts, and table 1.2 contained therein is most interesting.

The Farm Credit Corporation, a corporation established to help farmers and a corporation reporting directly to the Minister of Agriculture, has increased its non-tax revenue, or its return on investments, from $133 million in 1977 to $243 million in 1981.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Phillips: This is an annual increase, honourable senators, of $110 million.

An Hon. Senator: Unbelievable!

Senator Phillips: Would the minister responsible for the Wheat Board request the Minister of Agriculture to return the drastic increase to the farmers and thus help out those farmers who are in dire straits?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I am interested in having that information because I did not have it prior to listening to Senator Phillips. I understand, however, that this profit, this return which was made by the Farm Credit Corporation, is returned to the treasury for loans and advances that have been made. Perhaps it is an indication that the Farm Credit Corporation is in very good shape. Perhaps this will be an additional argument to be used by the Minister of Agriculture in his continuing campaign to strengthen the Farm Credit Corporation and to increase the facilities at its disposal.

Senator Phillips: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. I wish I could share the minister's joy about the improved financial situation of the Farm Credit Corporation.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Just try.

Senator Phillips: Actually, I am more interested in the financial situation of the farmers. I hope that the minister shares that concern.

Since $243 million will be paid as return on investment this year, a year in which the Federation of Agriculture is requesting that an additional $300 million be available to the Farm Credit Corporation for loans to farmers, would the minister responsible for the Wheat Board recommend to the Minister of Agriculture and to his cabinet colleagues that the $243 million paid as return on investment this year be loaned out at the rate that was in effect before the government raised it by about 3¼ per cent on October 1? This would be an excellent example to the banks and to other financial institutions, and I am sure they would follow the example of the government.

Senator Argue: I appreciate the concern of Senator Phillips for the welfare of the farmer. I am not going to comment on the details of the question that he has put to me. I believe that anything that can be done to make it possible for the Farm Credit Corporation to expand its operations should be encouraged.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: I will be pleased to study, at greater length and in more detail, the important suggestions that the honourable senator has made.

Senator Phillips: I thank the honourable minister for his expression of concern. The Minister of Agriculture has stated that he has written to the Minister of Finance stating that the high interest rates established by the federal government are the major cause of the financial difficulties of farmers.

• (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, he did not say that.

Senator Phillips: Would he join the Minister of Agriculture in making these recommendations to the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister?

Senator Argue: Those recommendations have already been made and they have already been supported, so there is no need for any encouragement from the honourable senator.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You could use a little encouragement.

Senator Argue: I certainly do not know what is in the budget, any more than anyone else in this chamber knows.

Senator Flynn: You attend cabinet meetings.

Senator Argue: I am optimistic that the budget will consider the concerns expressed by the Honourable Senator Phillips and will be addressing government policy towards those ends.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL GRANTS TO POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has the minister replied, and, if so, in what terms, to the representations made by the Western Regional Conference of University Faculty Associations calling on him as a——representative of the Liberal Party in Western Canada to state whether he supports or opposes the proposed drastic cuts in the fiscal transfers to the provinces under the Established Programs Financing legislation, particularly the funds for post-secondary education. The Associations commend to Mr. Perrault the unanimous report of the Parliamentary Task Force on the Established Programs Financing opposing any significant cuts in federal financial support of universities. If Mr. Perrault supports such cuts, the Associations call on Mr. Perrault to resign his parliamentary responsibilities since these proposals will undermine the educational, scientific and cultural development of Western Canada.

Has the minister replied to those representations? If so, in what terms?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators may be aware that I reply assiduously to all letters addressed to my office. I cannot say whether I have received that letter as yet. Apparently, a copy was rushed to the office of the Honourable Senator Murray before the letter was delivered to mine. I would appreciate it if Senator Murray would provide me with a copy—

Senator Murray: With a draft reply.

Senator Perrault: —with a copy of the letter from this apparently non-partisan source so that I will be able to answer earlier than is my accustomed fashion, which is very quickly.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT RATE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for the economy—which is quite a title. Having heard of the Prime Minister last night urging Canadians to join with him in exercising restraint, as he and his friends sat down to a $175-a-plate dinner, which is certainly a great example of restraint, it occurred to me to wonder whether the Prime Minister is aware that there are nearly one million Canadians already joining him in exercising restraint, as they go round the countryside looking for jobs. That includes thousands of people in Newfoundland, about whom I have inquired several times in this house. Can the minister tell me whether, in the exercise of this restraint, there is any future for these people in terms of employment?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes. Honourable senators, the government is very keenly aware of the unemployment levels in this country and the hardship that goes with them. The government is also keenly aware of the inflation problem in this country, which, of course, in the long run leads to exacerbating the first part of the problem. What the Prime Minister was saying was slightly different from what the honourable senator reported him as saying. The Prime Minister said that he hoped Canadians across the country would join him and follow the example of restraint in government spending.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Join him? What does he do?

Senator Doody: Let me ask a supplementary question. I know what the Prime Minister said. He was speaking to a $175-per-plate, blue chip, Liberal audience. He asked for “collective support of collective restraint.” He said:

I am asking Canadians to support their national Government in its determination to fight inflation as the No. 1 enemy.

How much of that $175 can be accounted for by inflation? How many people who are unemployed can afford to have even a $175 six-month grocery bill? This sort of thing is just incredible! I ask the honourable minister what plans he has to try to ease the burden of those people out there who cannot afford a $175 anything.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not quite sure there is any difference between the $175 per plate paid for that fund-raising dinner and the amount paid by the substantially higher number of people, according to the Conservatives, who went to hear the leader of that party, and which, in any event, probably doesn't have any effect whatever, one way or the other, on the people who cannot afford $175 for that kind of dinner.

My honourable friend knows quite well what distribution is made of funds collected for party matters at functions such as the one that took place last night. It applies equally to all parties in this country.

Senator Doody: The Honourable Senator Roblin earlier was asking what had happened to the gas bank. It seems fairly obvious where the gas bank went.

What I want to know is what the Right Honourable the Prime Minister is doing in terms of unemployment in the country. I was not asking for a breakdown of party expenses or for any guidelines on party fund-raising.

Senator Olson: You were not, but you were trying to relate it to the so-called $175 a plate, and my honourable friend can have a detailed explanation about that, if he wants one. I can get one showing the manner in which the Conservative Party sells those tickets as well. It is exactly the same.

In terms of what the Prime Minister is doing with respect to unemployment and measures to alleviate that situation, there is a very long list of programs and enhanced programs undertaken by a variety of departments to be as helpful as possible in that situation. I will bring the list into the chamber, but it will take me at least 40 to 60 minutes even to give a cursory explanation of each one of the items on the list. In my view, that is not the kind of question that can be adequately answered in Question Period.

GRAIN

1981 HARVEST—SALES TO POLAND

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I should like to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board whether he can report to this chamber on the results of the grain harvest in Canada for 1981, and whether there is any grain available in the Canadian inventory to sell to needy countries such as Poland, which is experiencing food shortages.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I thank the honourable senator for his question. The western producers had a record grain harvest this current year. I believe the total was approximately 44 million tonnes. The grain is in very good shape because harvest weather was generally excellent. Consequently, it is of high quality.

With respect to Poland, I can say that there is an existing long-term agreement which was signed in 1979, in which Canada, through the Canadian Wheat Board, agreed to make available to Poland between 1 million and 1.5 million tonnes of grain per year. Negotiations have taken place for sales of grain to Poland for the calendar year 1982. Those sales are going forward and the quantities will be within the same range, between 1 million and 1.5 million tonnes. The grains will be a mix of spring wheat and Durum and barley and oats. The Government of Canada has made available to Poland credit to the extent of $500 million, most or all of which will be used for the purchase of grain covered by this long-term agreement.

Senator Haidasz: Can the minister divulge to us any information about the terms of that credit sale, in particular, and whether one of the terms was an extension from three to five years of the period for payment for such grain?

● (1500)

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I understand that the extension is for at least three years. The system being used is the normal one, and the Canadian Wheat Board will make the grain available and complete the sale. The money will be obtained from the chartered banks of Canada and will be guaranteed by the federal government. The $500 million is not the full amount of the sale, but it is a very substantial part of it.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. Quite often, Canada and other industrialized countries have allowed Third World countries a remission of debt when they were unable to meet their payments. In view of the extremely difficult economic situation in Poland, has Canada and have other industrialized countries which are providing temporary financing, considered a remission of debt for Poland, in view of the fact that they do so for Third World countries who are in financial difficulty?

[English]

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I can reply to Senator Asselin that the postponement of payment of monies owed to Canada was made by Canada in recent months, and that Canada has extended for a further period payment of 90 per cent of the monies owed to Canada by Poland.

Senator Asselin: Would the minister ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to look into the matter to determine whether it would be possible for Canada to make a remittance of the debts of Poland?

Senator Argue: Is the honourable senator referring to a gift?

Senator Asselin: Not a gift, a remission.

Senator Argue: Does the honourable senator mean, extend the 10 per cent?

Senator Asselin: Yes.

Senator Argue: I would be happy to pass along the senator's suggestion. I believe that Canada has been responding to Poland's needs in a very constructive way. The honourable senator's question shows generally underlying support for this action in light of the difficulties which we all recognize that country now faces. I think the honourable senator's suggestion is important, and I will be very happy to relay it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RETIREMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF PENSION COMMISSION— QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question of privilege was raised by Senator Marshall on October 20 concerning the distribution to the Senate of press releases from the Department of Veterans Affairs. The particular press release that Senator Marshall referred to was, indeed, sent to Joint Distribution by the Department of Veterans Affairs. Apparently there was some sort of confusion at that source.

I have contacted the minister's office and I have been given the assurance that a sufficient number of copies of press releases will be made available to honourable senators in the future. I want to apologize to honourable senators for the fact that there was a breakdown in the system in some fashion. I believe that personal explanations as well have been extended to Senator Marshall concerning the matter.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO KOREA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Muir regarding the visit of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to the Republic of Korea on October 15, 1981.

The Prime Minister visited the Republic of Korea from September 27 to 29 en route to the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting held in Melbourne. The visit—the first official visit by a Canadian Prime Minister—went some distance in furthering the development of our good relations with Korea, a relationship which has undergone remarkable growth in recent years, particularly in its dynamic economic dimension.

The Prime Minister held discussions with President Chun Doo Hwan, Prime Minister Nam Duck-Woo and a number of Korean ministers. He met with Canadian businessmen, honoured Canadian war-dead at the United Nations Cemetery in Pusan, visited the Canadian community at the Candu reactor site of Wolsung and toured the ancient cultural centre of Kyongju.

The Prime Minister's talks with Korean leaders were friendly and open. Among the subjects discussed were North-South (economic) issues (with a view to Cancun) and strategic-security concerns on the Korean Peninsula and in the region. The Prime Minister reconfirmed Canada's support of President Chun's proposals earlier this year for a dialogue with North Korea and for the membership of both Koreas in the United Nations. He also drew attention to the concern of Canadians over the human rights situation in Korea, while recognizing the security problems posed by the threat from North Korea.

On bilateral matters, the Prime Minister underlined Canada's strong interest in further sales of Candu reactors and enhanced cooperation in the nuclear field. Korea has already purchased one 600 MWe Candu reactor, which is due to be completed in late 1982, and has expressed interest in additional units, at the Wolsung site. In competition with a number of other foreign suppliers, AECL and EDC are now compiling a comprehensive technical and financial bid for consideration in the near future by Korea Electric Company.

Mr. Trudeau also supported Canadian sales efforts as regards wheat, lumber, telecommunications and aircraft and discussed cooperation and investment potential in the energy sector.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I pose one supplementary question to the Leader of the Government. During the discussions between the Prime Minister and Korea Electric Company, was the question of interest rates brought up? If the Leader of the Government does not have that information with him, would he please attempt to obtain it? There is the possibility that we may lose potential business to other countries.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled They Served—We Care, tabled in the Senate on October 20, 1981.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, this report, They Served—We Care, is short because we took the time to make it say what needed to be said as strongly and concisely as possible. By keeping it short we hoped it would be read carefully and thoughtfully and that, most important of all, it would lead to action. I am sure that by now all of you have read it. During this debate Senator Bonnell and Senator Marshall have ably and eloquently summarized our conclusions and our reasons for the recommendations. I am, therefore, only going to speak briefly in very general terms.

The report is non-partisan because party politics should have no place in legislation concerning the well-being of servicemen and women and their families. It was loyalty to Canada, not loyalty to any one party, that sent young volunteers to risk their lives on land and sea and in the skies. The young people, now old people, who lost their health and their dreams of the future fought for all of us, regardless of political party.

The report is compassionate. It recognizes the long years of pain and discouragement endured by disabled men and women. It recognizes the rights and needs of the wives and husbands who have taken care of them under exceedingly sad and stressful conditions. The recommendations do not ask for more than what common decency demands. The report is wise because the recommendations do not ask for more than the government should be able to pay.

I want to thank Senator Marshall for his generous words about me yesterday. He was too generous because the tedious job of research and boiling down the mass of material was largely done by Grant Purves, a member of our secretariat on loan from the Library of Parliament. He and I worked together on the rewriting and editing of the final draft, and, of course, the chairman and Senator Marshall had a great deal to say about the final draft.

Two minor errors in the text have been drawn to my attention and I want to correct them now for the record. In paragraph 20, it says:

—in addition to the exceptional incapacity allowance, the pensioner gets a clothing allowance which amounts to a maximum of $60.84 a month. If in need of attendance, he can draw an attendance allowance which is considered as an encumbered income. Although the latter cannot be spent for unauthorized purposes, this income comes into the family so that the pensioner can employ a person to do the housekeeping, shovel the snow, and so on.

The fact is that there are no strings attached to the attendance allowance. For example, if members of the family perform these services themselves, instead of working outside of the home to earn necessary money, they are free to do so.

There is also a minor error in paragraph 21. The first sentence reads as follows:

All the above allowances are terminated on the first day of the month following the death of the veteran.

The fact is that the clothing allowance indeed is terminated on the first day of the month following the death of the veteran. The calculations in the report are, therefore, quite correct since they do not include the clothing allowance.

• (1510)

A month after the veteran's death, the widow will find her income cut by $825 a month. A month is obviously a very short time to expect an aged, grief-stricken woman to make a complete change in her way of living. Your committee agreed wholeheartedly that this amounts to ungenerous and even inhumane treatment. That is why we recommended that:

The surviving spouse of a deceased veteran in receipt of an Exceptional Incapacity and/or Attendance Allowance continue to receive such allowance for a period of one year following the death of the veteran.

Honourable senators, as we are all aware, there are husbands of veterans who have given long-time care to their disabled wives. However, I mention widows specifically because the majority of the widowed spouses of veterans are women, many of them in their late seventies and eighties.

In 1977-78 the number of female veterans receiving disability allowances was 286, while the number of male disabled veterans was 107,609. The wide difference in numbers is, of course, understandable, since women did not take part in combat duty and so there were a great many more men than women in the armed services.

In conclusion, it is right and proper that members of committees should always undergo careful soul-searching before they make recommendations that would cost the public treasury considerable amounts of money. In this case, no one should have any compunction about urging the government to implement our recommendations. They will, of course, involve an increase in the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs, but only for a short time. The added sums of money will shrink rapidly every year because disabled veterans and the spouses of disabled veterans are dying at the rate of between 450 and 500 per month.

If we are spared the agony of another war, this means that the cost of caring becomes less and less as time goes on.

[Translation]

I trust that this report entitled "They Served—We Care" will receive the unanimous support of the members of this chamber.

As we all know, the family is essential to the well-being of humanity and to the growth of our society.

For many long and difficult years, the wives of veterans have provided men who were seriously wounded in combat with the security of the family environment. They have also saved the government a considerable amount of money. It costs about $4,000 a month to provide intensive care for an invalid veteran in a chronic care home or a veterans' home such as Deer Lodge Hospital.

Therefore, the widows of these men deserve our gratitude, not only for their dedication but also for their contribution to our country.

Your committee believes that words of gratitude are not enough. We believe there is an obligation to take care of these widows once they are alone, grieving, often poor and almost always old.

We have an obligation because they too have served their country.

[English]

As individuals we can show our gratitude to those men and women who served in different ways by buying a poppy on November 11.

As senators, I think we can do much more by demanding immediate action to implement the recommendations in the report of your committee.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Bonnell calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-seventh Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Munich, Federal Republic of Germany, from 11th to 16th October, 1981, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, following Senator Bonnell's interesting and informative account, particularly in the scientific field, of the deliberations of the Twenty-seventh Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, which was held in Munich, Germany, on October 11 to 16 this year, I should like, first of all, to express profound thanks to the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany and particularly to the Government of the Free State of Bavaria, headed by Minister-President Franz-Joseph Strauss, for the outstanding and gracious hospitality accorded to all delegates and their spouses. The extensive programs, the royal type of entertainment of opera and music, and the lavish variety of tasteful foods and fine beverages reflects the prosperity and the high standard of living of the Bavarian Germans. What is much more important, however, is Germany's solid support of the Alliance, as has been witnessed by the fervent spirit of loyalty and co-operation.

I should like to inform honourable senators that I was very proud of the Canadian delegation, headed by Mr. Len Hopkins, MP. Our delegation, composed of six senators and 12 MPs, unlike most of the other parliamentary delegations of the 15 NATO countries, presented a strong, united front, on a tri-partisan basis, in the standing committees and in the plenary sessions of the Assembly. This has won the respect of the other countries and has facilitated the election of some of our members to rapporteurships of committees and subcommittees, which are responsible for the many-sided work of the Assembly throughout the coming year.

I wish to report on my participation in the Canadian delegation and in the work of the North Atlantic Assembly. I have had the honour of representing Canada for nine years, this being the record for any delegate since the first annual session in 1955. During the past four years I have been rapporteur of the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People, having been unanimously elected to that position by delegates of the allied countries. Naturally, I am most grateful for having been given the rare opportunity to serve the cause of freedom and democracy at the international level.

Since the ruling of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association, of which I have been vice-chairman since 1975, indicates that a delegate may be selected at most for a three-year term, unless such a person is elected at the Assembly to any of its positions, whether on the executive or in the committees, now that my four-year term as rapporteur has expired it appears that I shall no longer qualify to be selected as a delegate to the North Atlantic Assembly. It is only right that other parliamentarians should be given the opportunity to participate in the Assembly of the parliaments of the North Atlantic Alliance.

That being the case, I should like to review briefly some of the more important work of the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People for which I was responsible during my four-year term, from 1977 to 1981, as rapporteur. I must admit that I was greatly moved when the subcommittee expressed its gratitude for my contributions, which gratitude was also subsequently expressed in the plenary session.

The subcommittee has constantly monitored the implementation and violations of Principles Seven and Eight of Basket One and all of Basket Three of the Helsinki Final Act signed by 33 European states and two North American countries in 1975. This was done in the Bulletin, a quarterly journal published by the North Atlantic Assembly and circulated to all governments and parliaments in the Alliance, as well as to universities, organizations and interested individuals.

Violations of human, group and national rights and the fundamental freedoms perpetrated by the Soviet Union and the Soviet-bloc countries were recorded and protested by the North Atlantic Assembly as well as by parliaments of the member countries.

The subcommittee has heard as witnesses some of the leading dissidents who have been expelled by the U.S.S.R.—to name a few: General Petro Grigorenko, Ludmila Alekseyeva, Leonid Plyushch, Vladimir Bukovsky and many others. Governments and parliaments of the NATO Alliance were urged to protest on behalf of a large and growing number of imprisoned and sentenced dissidents. Some of these protests were effective, with the result that some were released, a notable case being Valentyn Moroz, who is well known in Canada. Outstanding dissidents such as Andrei Sakharov and Alexander Solzhenitsyn have urged the continuation of the protests and support of the Helsinki-monitoring movement in the U.S.S.R.

The subcommittee has closely followed the proceedings of the Belgrade Review Conference and the present Madrid Review Conference, both of which I attended as a Canadian delegate-observer. Dr. Herbert Hupka, of Germany, the chairman, and I, as the rapporteur, were designated by the President of the North Atlantic Assembly, Congressman Jack Brooks, as a working group, to report on the Madrid Conference. In early March 1981 we attended some of the sessions and discussed the problems with several ambassadors, and subsequently presented a detailed report to the subcommittee and the Assembly. We were happy to note that the western countries, under the leadership of NATO, were solidly united on a balanced review to be reflected in the Final Document of the CSCE Conference in Madrid.

The subcommittee has been in constant contact with Radio Free Europe, which broadcasts daily to the Eastern European Communist-bloc countries, and Radio Liberty, which broadcasts daily to the Soviet Union in 21 languages. Members of the subcommittee visited the facilities, employing 1,700 personnel, in Munich in February 1979 and this year on October 13, during which times they studied the operations and the effectiveness of the broadcasting, which is subsidized by the United States Congress in the amount of approximately $100 million annually. For example, Radio Free Europe broadcasts 20 hours daily in the Polish language, and over 90 per cent of the adult population in Poland constantly listens to the programs, which have been informing the people of all events in the Polish revolution, which are not covered by the Communist-controlled government media. Radio Free Europe has had a moderating influence on the course of events in Poland and, to some degree, on the other Communist-bloc states. The effectiveness of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty becomes apparent when it is realized that the Soviet Union spends three times more on jamming than on regular broadcasting to Europe and North America. Jamming is a violation of the Helsinki Agreement, which the North Atlantic Assembly and the NATO countries have been protesting, but so far to no avail.

The subcommittee has commissioned and produced several factual reports on various aspects of the human rights movement in the U.S.S.R. These include the Samizdat—the underground press and publications in the Soviet Union; The Helsinki Monitoring Groups of Moscow and Kiev, Ukraine; the repression of religious groups; individual cases such as Andrei Sakharov, Anatoli Scharansky and others; as well as national minorities, for example, the Germans and Tatars, who have been forcibly transplanted. It is planned to produce studies on national groups such as the Ukrainians, Byelorussians, Georgians, the Baltic Nations, the Moslem peoples and so forth. Such reports and studies keep our parliamentarians and readers of the Bulletin abreast of events in the Soviet-bloc camp. There is an increasing demand for such information and materials, the knowledge of which will help to facilitate the free flow of information and people and, hopefully, improve the welfare and status of these oppressed nations and minority groups.

The subcommittee has held meetings with world leaders, government officials and parliamentary groups. The meeting with Pope John Paul II on March 12, 1980 achieved co-operation in these matters of religious persecution. There were meetings with government ministers and officials of Greece, Italy and the United States, with members and officials of the U.S. Commission on CSCE and officials of the Voice of America, including Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty, and with the U.S. Ambassador to the Madrid Conference, Max Kampelman. Intensive discussions were held with top officials of the Division of Human Rights in the United Nations Secretariat in New York and with the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, Mr. Lichtenstein, which helped to bring about better understanding of mutual relations in the defence and promotion of human rights in the international arena. Plans include the continuation of such meetings with governments of other NATO countries and with officials of agencies in the United Nations responsible for human rights.

It was a great honour for Canada to have hosted the Twenty-fifth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly in Ottawa in October 1979. The invitation came from the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information, of which Ralph Stewart, M.P., of Canada was chairman and I a member. The Twenty-fifth Anniversary of NATO's parliamentary assembly was highlighted by a gala commemorative concert in the National Arts Centre which featured cultural manifestations of each of the NATO countries, composing a mass spectacle of allied unity, the first demonstration of unity in cultural and national diversity in the history of the Alliance.

Honourable senators, I look back on my nine-year participation in the work of the North Atlantic Assembly with some satisfaction and also with some pride, having witnessed the prestige of Canada steadily rising. I hope that my "swan song" will evoke some sympathy and perhaps appreciation of Canada's role in the Alliance.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak on this inquiry, the inquiry is considered as having been debated.

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, there were at least four other members of the Senate who were delegates at this Twenty-seventh Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly. Since they are not present today, and in the event that one of them wishes to participate in this debate, I suggest that the Acting Deputy Leader of the Government adjourn this debate on their behalf.

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 3, 1981, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 3, 1981

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN J. CONNOLLY, P.C.

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION FROM SENATE

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I rise to draw to the attention of the Senate the retirement of my desk-mate, the Honourable John Connolly. I do so with mixed feelings. For personal reasons, which go back a long way, I shall miss him very much; but, on the other hand, I am very happy that he is retiring in such good health, and looking forward to retirement with some eagerness.

John Connolly's career is a rather interesting one. Ever since I came to this chamber, some nine years ago, I have sat beside the honourable senator and I have found him to be a very interesting person. Our discussions were of some interest—at least to the two of us. We seemed to develop a faculty for discussing the affairs of Canada, and quite a few of the affairs of the world, in a way that was easy and agreeable. Unfortunately, our solutions did not get into the statute books, so they had no binding effect. For those reasons, I have fond memories of my association with Senator Connolly.

It is interesting to reflect upon Senator Connolly's career in public life. He was educated at three universities—Queen's University, Kingston; the University of Montreal; and the University of Notre Dame in the United States. He started his career with the concepts of the two larger provinces in the country, and a familiarity with the association of this country with the United States.

Honourable senators, I became a member of the House of Commons in 1940. I am sure you will remember the tragic and sudden loss at that time of the then Minister of National Defence, the Honourable Norman Rogers, from Kingston. Shortly thereafter, the responsibility for national defence was divided up among three ministers—the Minister of National Defence for Air; the Minister of National Defence for Army; and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. When the Honourable Angus Macdonald came from Nova Scotia to become the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, he, like all new ministers, required an executive assistant. John Connolly was highly recommended by the member of the House of Commons for Ottawa West to that friendly and receptive minister, who thought it a good idea and appointed him his executive assistant. Senator Connolly served with Angus Macdonald during the period of time he was a cabinet minister.

Senator Connolly was summoned to the Senate in 1953. In 1964 he was appointed Leader of the Government in the Senate and remained in that position for most of the life of the Pearson government. When he was Leader of the Government in the Senate, I was a cabinet minister and also Government House Leader in the Commons. As a result, I met with Senator Connolly almost daily during that period.

As an aside, I would add that the interests of the Senate were assiduously looked after in certain places where there are discussions that are never disclosed. I can assure honourable senators that we were never permitted to forget the place and importance of the Senate in the Parliament of Canada. Section 17 of the British North America Act had meaning, and Senator Connolly was fully aware of that fact and brought it to our attention on all proper occasions. He did this with good manners, considerable ability and effectiveness.

In any event, Senator Connolly has retired because he has reached the age of 75. I content myself by drawing the matter to the attention of the Senate and wishing him—I am sure I speak for all honourable senators in this respect—a long, happy, and healthy retirement. I also extend to his wife and two sons our good wishes on this occasion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my friend John Connolly wrote to me last week to say good-bye. That is the type of man he is—warm, friendly, considerate; a man who is ever-willing to take that extra step and make that extra gesture. Of him we can truly say that he is a gentleman in every sense of the word.

There was a brief period in the mid-sixties during which John Connolly and I led our respective forces in this place. I was a rookie in the job; he had been at it for a few years. As Senator McIlraith has mentioned, it was in 1964 that he was appointed Leader of the Government in the Senate. Well, I became Leader of the Opposition on October 31, 1967, the date of his 61st birthday. Never would I have expected an adversary to be so kind and so helpful. As a result of his co-operation, understanding and innate sense of fair play, I have nothing but the fondest of memories of that short period.

Now, I would not want Senator Perrault to take offence, nor would I want my friend Paul Martin to, and it was not my intention to make comparisons that reflect badly on them, but the era during which John and I faced one another as leaders was different, very different. That was probably because I was new to the job and was timid.

An Hon. Senator: You were?

Senator Flynn: I was hoping to get some reaction to that remark. Conditions then did not require our being so partisan and militant as we are today, and that had its advantages.

Over the years we have all had the opportunity to listen to speeches by John Connolly. John is a man of letters, a philosopher, with many excellent insights and a fluency equal to the task of articulating them brilliantly, but John was at his very best when he was eulogizing someone. That is when he would let out all the stops. He could paint word portraits of a person which, if put to canvas, would remind one of Rembrandt.

My only wish this evening is that I could be as gifted in this area as is John Connolly. My reason for so wishing is that then I might pay more fitting tribute to a man who has done so much to give politics and politicians a good name.

He is an honest, decent man, one of formidable intellectual capacity. The Senate is much the better for his having spent close to three decades as a member of it. Senator McIlraith mentioned that John was summoned to the Senate 28 years ago. He brought substance, style and grace to the upper chamber, and those of us who have known him best and longest appreciate with great sadness what a significant loss this chamber and the body politic suffer as a result of this retirement.

● (2015)

To my respected former adversary and his beloved wife, Ida, I extend my very best wishes, as well as those of the P.C. caucus, for a long, healthy and happy retirement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government):

Honourable senators, Senator Perrault and the other cabinet ministers were called to a cabinet meeting tonight at 8 o'clock. They will return as soon as they are free to. I am sure that, either this evening or on another occasion, they will want to add to what has already been so eloquently said about Senator John Connolly.

I would like to add a few personal words. I first really got to know Senator Connolly almost 20 years ago, when he was president of the Liberal Party of Canada and I was one of his lieutenants as president of the Liberal Party in Ontario. I worked with him then, and I have learned over the years since that there is much to be learned from Senator Connolly. He wrote to me also—as I think he did to most of us who knew him—on the occasion of his retirement. I told him that I could not really yet believe that he was not still going to be with us because he represents to us, and I think to many people in this country, everything that a Canadian senator should be. I suppose we are going to have to get used to the fact that he is not going to be here with us in the chamber, but I refuse to get used to the fact and will not get used to the fact that that means we are not going to be seeing him, as I hope we will.

I do not believe that many people can truly fulfil the description of gentleman, scholar and statesman. John Connolly is a gentleman. John Connolly is a scholar, as some of us know because of his work at Notre Dame and at St. Michael's College. John Connolly is a politician and statesman in the best sense.

I want to conclude my remarks by quoting my friend George Brimmell in his article in the Toronto Sun on October 25, 1981, when he stated:

I've shared many a chuckle with Senator Connolly over the tragic events in Dallas, on Nov. 22, 1963. His namesake, the then governor of Texas, was severely wounded by Lee Harvey Oswald . . . and in the Medicine Hat News the next day there was a photo of our Senator John Connolly, with the caption: "Near death."

Boy, were they wrong!

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I am glad that as we say a temporary good-bye here to John Connolly we are also able to say that he is still with us and will continue to be, because if there is anyone, in my experience, who has worked harder for the Senate than John Connolly, to retain the importance of the Senate in our legislative system, I do not know who it is. There are many here who are aware of the work that John Connolly did behind the scenes over and over again in times that, with hindsight, were quite critical for the future of this chamber. I know that his interest in the Senate will continue and that he will have a great influence on the future of this Senate, reformed or unreformed, but continuing the work it was destined to do and has already done.

The phrase that immediately comes to mind when one thinks of John Connolly is "unfailing courtesy." My earliest recollection of John Connolly goes back to the year 1957, an important year for me because it was the first time my picture ever appeared in a newspaper anywhere as a result of my having a role in politics. Opposite my picture, as one who was active on the Conservative side, was that of the renowned, distinguished and formidable Liberal senator, John Connolly, who was then said to be my opposite number in the activities of that time.

I recall how scared I was as I looked up his distinguished background, some aspects of which have been indicated by Senator McIlraith and the Deputy Leader of the Government. I said, "I can't be in the same league as this man." When I came to the Senate, before he was Leader of the Government in the Senate, he took me into his confidence, welcomed me and gave me some very useful advice, not all of which I took. I regret that I did not take all of it.

I recall also how helpful he was when he became Leader of the Government in the Senate. Those of us who can look back to our early days here will remember how much we needed the help of those who had been here a long time and were willing to help and guide us regardless of the side of the house on which we sat.

I am sure that many honourable senators will agree with me that John Connolly made a tremendous contribution to what has become one of the distinguishing features of the Senate, namely, the outstanding work that has been and is being done in our committees. I can recall John Connolly on many occasions catching the eye of the chairman and making a comment which often summarized the discussion and seemed to say exactly what should be and often was the consensus of the members of the committee.

It is typical of John Connolly that he is not in the Senate chamber tonight. I have been told that his absence is deliberate. John Connolly was not one who wished to sit here and hear so many of us say the nice things that we wish to say on an occasion such as this; and I am glad to hear the Deputy Leader of the Government say that in view of the necessary and unavoidable absence of some of John Connolly's friends here, further tributes may be paid on another occasion. I hope they will.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself briefly with the tributes that have already been extended by other honourable senators to Senator John Connolly. My friendship with him goes back to the mid-1950s when I was Premier, and Leader of the Liberal Party, of Nova Scotia, shortly after he had become a member of the Senate and just before he became the National President of the Liberal Party. He was always friendly and ready to be helpful to me, a much younger politician in those days, and that friendship continued until I recall his welcoming me when I was sworn into the Senate, now almost 10 years ago.

In those days, the Speaker of the Senate did not automatically hold receptions for new senators, as has become the practice in recent years, but Senator John Connolly extended that hospitality to me and also, I believe, to Senator McIlraith and others who were sworn in on that day.

Senator John Connolly is a wise person. His eloquence and scholarship have already been referred to; his zealous espousal and support of the Senate and its role in Parliament have also been referred to; and I associate myself with all the good things that have been said about Senator John Connolly, a really splendid gentleman.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Later]

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not intend to repeat all that has been said, first, with respect to Senator Connolly.

[English]

I have not known Senator Connolly for as long as Senator McIlraith has known him. However, he was a colleague of mine when I first went into the cabinet in 1965. I remember that at that time he would worry about me, and would give me advice on any subject, be it political or intellectual.

Senator Connolly would worry about all the other members. If he learned that somebody was sick, he always showed his concern by the countless questions he would ask.

John Connolly is a strong man and a philosopher, and the kind of human being that we are all happy to have with us. I cannot accept that he has left. I will take it upon myself to invite him here as often as possible so that we do not lose sight of him.

THE LATE HONOURABLE THÉRÈSE F. CASGRAIN

TRIBUTES

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words in homage to a great lady who passed away today. I refer to Senator Thérèse Casgrain.

[Translation]

"I am no longer satisfied to be an old lady sitting serenely on the sidelines. I see myself now as a black sheep with grey hair, a rebel who shudders at the thought of any kind of fence, gilded or otherwise, and who wants active involvement."

This is how Thérèse Casgrain expressed herself when asked to elaborate on the theme: Old age, a time for growth.

After fighting for 20 years to get women in Quebec the right to vote and their own entitlement to family allowance, Mrs. Casgrain was subsequently very active in the CCF, in the "Voix des femmes", the Human Rights Foundation, the Quebec Federation of Women and many other reform movements. She later worked very hard for the cause of Indian women who were driven off their reserves because they had married white men.

She also took up the cause of those who lost their jobs upon reaching retirement age. She said that this was classifying people by the year in which they were born, without considering factors such as personality and individual differences.

In a way, this was also what she felt upon terminating her all too brief stay in the Upper Chamber. In fact, she was here only nine months. In 1971, I had the honour of being appointed her successor, but I would never be able to take her place.

During the Quebec referendum, Mrs. Casgrain dedicated all her energy to the campaign. Whenever she appeared on the hustings, she was greeted by thunderous applause. She had become a symbol of down-to-earth common sense and tenacity, she had tremendous confidence in the ability and potential of Canadian women and an unshakeable faith in her Canada "from coast to coast", a Canada she had crisscrossed in all directions in reply to hundreds of invitations and to receive her many honorary degrees.

For 10 years I enjoyed her valuable friendship as well as her frequent visits here, I witnessed her concern, her enthusiasm and her indignation, and I experienced her charming hospitality at home. I now wish to add my simple tribute to those she received this afternoon in the other house.

Her departure fills us with great sadness, and tonight, all women in Quebec will feel as though they had lost a mother.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, upon the death of Thérèse Casgrain, we remember an almost legendary figure in Quebec politics, whose life reads nearly like a novel. Thérèse Casgrain was born into a wealthy family; her father, Sir Rodolphe Forget, built the railway line from Quebec to La Malbaie, a very risky undertaking at the time, at the beginning of this century. She later married Justice Pierre Casgrain, who was Speaker of the House of Commons and Secretary of State before being appointed to the Superior Court. As Senator Renaude Lapointe pointed out, she was very active in all movements aimed at promoting women's rights, and she was more specifically involved in getting the vote for women at the provincial level in Quebec, a battle which she won in the forties. Thérèse Casgrain became interested in politics after her husband was appointed to the Superior Court in 1941.

She first ran for the Liberal Party in a by-election in Charlevoix county. She was defeated by an independent candidate during the war. It was not easy in those days. But this did not stop her. As they said on the news this evening, she ran nine times, once as a Liberal candidate, and eight times as a candidate either for the CCF or the New Democratic Party.

In fact, she was Quebec leader of that party for several years.

She came to the Senate in 1970, in October, eight or nine months before reaching the prescribed retirement age at the time, and left the Senate a little over ten years ago. This was in July 1971. It is hard to believe that only ten years have gone by, because during the short period she was with us, she managed to charm all the members of this chamber as she had done so often elsewhere. She was interested in almost every aspect of life, whether it was cultural, political, social, et cetera. Her biography in the Parliamentary Guide for 1971—the only one because she was with us for only a year; less than a year even—gives us the story of her eventful life and all the various causes to which she was dedicated.

Earlier, Senator Renaude Lapointe mentioned her role in the referendum campaign. She had a remarkable spontaneity, and whenever she spoke to a crowd, she was able to captivate her audience and to arouse its enthusiasm. She was very homesick for the Senate, because here at last she had an opportunity to speak in a legislative chamber. She had tried so often, and finally when she came here, she was able to experience what Parliament or a legislature, in any case the legislative process, was all about. I believe she liked and appreciated her stay with us tremendously.

We were always happy to see her when she came to visit us or when we happened to meet elsewhere. She was always very enthusiastic and had a great love for life. She was a constant fighter for women's rights and social justice. To me, her ties with the New Democratic Party bordered on the sentimental and were mainly based on her desire to help the socially deprived, since in many other ways she was a small "I" liberal as well as a small "c" conservative. We shall cherish her memory. She died suddenly, death came very simply, without warning. I believe it was the best way for this active joyous woman who loved life to leave it.

We offer her family our sincere sympathy, with the assurance that she will have a special place in the hearts of all Canadians.

● (2030)

[English]

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I would also like to say a few words about Senator Casgrain. I admired her immensely. She was a sort of guide, philosopher and friend for a great many years, and I am rather shaken that she is now dead.

[Translation]

She was a Québécoise of courage and great charm.

[English]

She, as Senator Flynn has said, ran in nine elections and was defeated in nine elections, but I do not think her spirit was ever defeated. I do not believe "defeat" was a word in her vocabulary.

I remember, when I was living in Montreal in the thirties, how I watched her with awe and admiration as she fought to get women the vote. I remember also how she bullied Mackenzie King until he gave family allowances to mothers in Quebec, after he had planned to give them to mothers in all of the other provinces but to fathers in Quebec. I remember she told me that she had hustled down here and, as far as I can gather, she beat him over the head and changed his mind.

Senator Casgrain had a great sense of humour and the gift to be able to laugh at herself, which is a rare quality. She had style—that built-in kind of indefinable quality which some people are born with and never lose. She had elegance, but she was also tough and a fighter. I remember when she, along with Grace MacInnis, brought two carloads of Indian women from Caughnawaga to appear at one of the evening hearings of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. It was a most dramatic evening and she succeeded in convincing all seven commissioners that Indian women are indeed discriminated against in the Indian Act. I also remember talking to her 10 years ago, when she was in this house. She was about to travel right across the country to attend hearings on, of all things, the Constitution. I said to her, "Thérèse, isn't that going to be very tiring for you?" She replied, "Florence, I have only nine months here and there is so much that needs to be done. There is so very much, that I must go on working."

I think those are words all of us should remember.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, the news we have just heard tonight comes as a great shock to me. I was not aware that Senator Thérèse Casgrain had died. She was a friend of mine and my wife's for a good many years. Since her retirement from the Senate, I had been seeing her nearly every week, or certainly very frequently, and I had spoken to her often; and recently, when I saw her, she was as full of vitality as ever.

Having only heard this news in the chamber this evening, I am afraid that I have not had time to reflect upon the kinds of things I should like to say; but I do not think that I can accept the news of her death without rising in this chamber to add my personal tribute.

I have always regarded Thérèse Casgrain as an exceptional woman. I grew up on the same street as her family lived on in Montreal. Her brother was associated with me in Les Canadiens Hockey Club. Incidentally, he did not agree with her political point of view, but then there were many people who did not agree with Thérèse's political point of view. That, however, could not detract from her character, which was really quite exceptional, for not only was she a champion of women's rights but she was also a champion of everything that is right. She had fine ideas and was both involved and keen politically, but that never gave her a distorted point of view about the essential issues in life, whether they were social or economic or moral. She set a great example not only to the women of Quebec, where she certainly was an inspiration, and not only to the women of Canada, but to all Canadians, because she set an enormously high standard as a person. In fact, her standard was of such a high degree that she will always be, at least in my mind, one of our greatest Canadians.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, like Senator Molson, I was shocked when I reached Ottawa just a little while ago to hear of the death of Thérèse Casgrain, a very old and dear friend of my wife and me. We were with her a week ago tonight at the swearing in of our friend Alice Desjardins as a Justice of the Superior Court of Quebec. Thérèse was not looking well. She had been ill, but she assured us that she was in good shape, and, as a matter of fact, just three days ago she phoned my wife. She had heard that our grandson, who was visiting us, had a bad cold. He is three and it was nothing serious, but she was concerned. Then she added, "Now remember, I am in good shape again. I am ready for another party." She loved life. She loved parties. The dinners at her house were most enjoyable and she was great company.

I do not have to add to what has already been said about her contribution in obtaining recognition of women's rights, but I was glad that it was pointed out by Senator Molson that Thérèse Casgrain was not only interested in women's rights, she was interested in human rights per se. I suggest to those of you who have not read her book, the story of her life, entitled A Woman in a Man's World, which is available both in English and in French, that you will find it worthwhile and very amusing.

I first met Thérèse Casgrain in 1933. I particularly remember her from 1935 on as the beautiful wife of Pierre Casgrain, who was then Speaker of the House of Commons. She was a beautiful young woman when I first met her and remained beautiful throughout her years.

Honourable senators, you have heard Senator Lapointe comment on her untiring campaign in the referendum. She was a great Canadian. I recall my wife trying to dissuade her one Sunday from travelling north by bus to make a speech. She was then in her eighty-fourth year. But she could not be held back because she was going to speak for Canada, and so she did.

The passing of Thérèse Casgrain is a great loss to my family. It is a great loss to Canada. She is one of the few Canadians who became a legend in her lifetime.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Peter Alan Stollery: Honourable senators, being new to this chamber, I did not come tonight with the intention of saying anything. However, I cannot allow this occasion to pass by without adding my own remarks. While travelling in China some years ago I had occasion to board a train going from Soochow to Shanghai. My companion, who was French-speaking, told me that there was a Canadian lady aboard. That Canadian lady was Thérèse Casgrain, and she, too, was going to Shanghai. We spent the next three or four days touring together, and my memory is of a truly great Canadian woman.

Our country is poorer because of her passing, but I was richer for having spent a few days with her and being able to say that since that time we maintained a very good friendship. I just wanted to add my words of sorrow upon hearing of the death of Thérèse Casgrain.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): If I may, honourable senators, I do not wish to add anything on behalf of the government but simply to say that the government echoes the remarks and personal recollections made here tonight on the death of Mrs. Casgrain. At this point I think that I would merely be repeating what has already been very well said. I would simply like to say a few words in English if I may.

[English]

I can remember sitting in the Café du Jardin in the Ritz-Carlton Hotel with Thérèse Casgrain and Madame Chaput-Rolland. I had just been introduced to Thérèse Casgrain, and I can say that I was in awe of her. Throughout the course of the dinner I listened to this woman, who, to people inside and outside Quebec—but particularly, I think, to anglophone Canadians—had a certain mystique. I remember sitting there and watching this woman of such patrician grace, stunning charm and powerful intellect tell me of the time she spent in jail because she had stood up for something in which she believed politically.

I have never forgotten Thérèse Casgrain. Every time I think of her I am reminded of what either Boswell himself said, or what he quoted someone else as saying, about Johnson, that no man could ever say that he knew another like him. I believe no Canadian is able to say that he or she has known another like her.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: As for Mrs. Casgrain, as far as I can think back, I have memories of Thérèse Casgrain. As you know, I was fairly active in social work in the province of Quebec, starting in 1942, and even somewhat before that as a student, and whenever there were important events, events that changed our lives in Quebec at that time and events that have occurred since then, Thérèse Casgrain was there. She was involved in the silicosis question, the asbestos strike, the women's rights battle, in fact, wherever there was a just cause to be fought, wherever there was discrimination, Thérèse Casgrain was there ready to fight for justice and to stand up against the discrimination that existed in Quebec. Some of you here know her family background even better than I do, and one wonders what there was that made her so sensitive to the problems of her fellow men. It is rather remarkable, but perhaps not exceptional, in Quebec, for instance, to see people from middle-class families suddenly becoming concerned with the lives of those less fortunate and dedicating a large part of their lives to defending and representing these people and to fighting injustice.

We say we have lost Thérèse Casgrain, but this is only a manner of speaking. I believe she will live on in our memory as an example and an inspiration, and in this respect, she can never be lost to us. I believe she will enter the history of the province of Quebec and the history of our country as one of the truly great who have served their fellow citizens and their country.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

MRS. CIOIA MARCONI BRAGA

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Honourable senators, allow me to extend a welcome to Mrs. Cioia Marconi Braga, the daughter of Guglielmo Marconi. I think everyone remembers him from the name they learned at school in Canadian history. Mrs. Braga is accompanied by Mr. Terzi and Mrs. Pagnata of the Italian embassy, who are here in the visitors' gallery.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, 4th November, 1981, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Explain, please.

Senator Frith: Mr. Speaker, before this motion is agreed to, I would like to give an explanation.

I have spoken to the chairman of the committee about tomorrow's meeting. He informed me that a native delegation will appear tomorrow in relation with Bill C-48 and that while this might not be the only opportunity for this delegation to appear, it is certainly the most convenient. This is why I told the chairman that I would introduce this motion, but whether or not it carries is up to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), moved.

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at three o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Wednesday, 4th November, 1981, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Are you going to give some explanation?

Senator Frith: If I may provide a word of explanation.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I do not need any explanation, I am the vice-chairman.

Senator Frith: You may not need any explanation, but although we may not find it desirable that these two committees sit in the afternoon at the same time as the Senate, this committee has to examine a certain report tomorrow. This of course causes some overlapping for those who sit on both committees.

[English]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is not a binding convention.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: It is certainly legal, but perhaps not constitutional. In any case, we shall see.

[English]

Senator Flynn: I said, "not binding." I will stick to my own definition.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: It is certain that the duties of those who sit on both committees overlap. This is why we wish to start at 3 o'clock in one case and at 4 in the other. However, I can assure you that it would normally be preferable not to have such a situation of two committees sitting at the same time as the Senate.

Senator Flynn: The Deputy Leader of the Government could perhaps stress the fact there is no legislation before the Senate at this time.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

SPECIAL INDUSTRY AND LABOUR ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM—
URBAN TRANSIT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION SYSTEM—
WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND—REQUEST FOR STATUS REPORTS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in the absence of all the ministers of the crown, may I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if he would obtain and present to us, at an early date, status reports in a number of areas?

Would he furnish us with a status report on the famous $350 million Special Industry and Labour Adjustment Program? Without giving offence, may I say that I do have copies of the press release of January 19, 1981, in which this program was announced, and the press release of March 16, 1981, in which the communities designated for adjustment assistance were listed. I also have a copy of the background document issued by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce on that occasion. I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to do us a kindness by not presenting a regurgitation of those press releases but, rather, by telling us how much money has been spent from this program; where; and, specifically, on what projects.

Honourable senators, also under the heading of status reports, may I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to report to us on the funds which were supposed to be granted by the federal government for the Urban Transit Development Corporation system to be supplied to Vancouver?

I should like to know whether Vancouver has, indeed, finally opted for the system; whether any money has been paid by the federal government to the province or to the municipality; what the source of any such funds might have been; and, in particular, whether any such funds have come from the famous Western Development Fund.

● (2100)

Finally, I note that my colleague, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, tried recently to obtain some information from the government about the Western Development Fund. May I simply add to those efforts my own question, which is: How much money has been spent from the fund; on what projects; and where?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no offence was intended to be given and no offence was taken.

I think each of those questions is clearly a request for information. Since the Honourable Senator Murray particularly does not want a repetition of certain documentary evidence that he already has, I wonder whether it would be appropriate to append that to his question so that the department will know what it is he does not want while looking up what it is he does want.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE STUDY OF VIA RAIL—APPEARANCE OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I have a question to address to the Deputy Leader of the Government. Is it the intention of the Minister of Transport to disdainfully ignore the formal request of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, to which was unanimously referred by this house a review of the abandonment by VIA Rail of approximately 20 per cent of the vital rail passenger service in Canada?

Because of the short time at our disposal, I think that if the minister is of the mind to ignore this committee—a committee of this house of Parliament—then he should reconsider, and do so soon.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as far as I am aware, it is not the intention of the Minister of Transport to disdainfully ignore anything.

Senator Riley: I point out to the deputy leader that I have it on fairly good authority that his intention is to either ignore it or not to appear before November 15.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF SUPERMARKET PRICE WAR

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question to seek information. I wonder if the deputy leader could inquire in the other place, or of the government, whether the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is investigating the price war that is going on in supermarkets. I should like to know how these poor, multi-corporation supermarkets, which cried that they were making only half of one per cent profit, can suddenly reduce their prices by 20 per cent. They are only doing that in one locale in Ontario, thereby denying other Canadians the benefits of this price war.

Is there an investigation taking place to determine how they can suddenly drop their prices by 20 per cent? And how can we get that price war spread down to Newfoundland, where the people are paying exorbitant prices?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly try to find out if an investigation is taking place, but the Honourable Senator Marshall knows an investigation can be triggered under the Combines Investigation Act by complaints. It may be that an investigation is under way, and if not, perhaps one can be triggered by such a complaint. However, I shall obtain what information I can on the present state of affairs of the pricing situation to which he has referred.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

POST OFFICE—NEWSPAPER REPORT OF CHANGE TO UNILINGUAL SIGNS IN MONTREAL

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. There was an article in a Montreal newspaper this morning in which the statement was made that the Post Office in Montreal was changing some of its bilingual signs to unilingual signs. I very much doubt this, in view of the long-term policy of the government, and of Parliament, as a matter of fact, and at a time when this particular subject about signs in Quebec is so touchy. Bearing that in mind, I find it difficult to believe that story, but I should like to ask my honourable friend if he could find out if there is any possibility that that report is accurate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, certainly prima facie, to quote another unofficial language, that would seem to be a breach of the Official Languages Act. I think the point is well taken, and I shall, with enthusiasm, try to find out if it is true.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—MEMBERSHIP OF TASK FORCE

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. Last week, the government established a task force to examine the textile situation in Canada. Apparently, they forgot to appoint representatives of the textile industry to it. The textile companies are now pressing the government to have company representatives on this textile industry task force.

Could the Deputy Leader of the Government find out why the government has failed to put representatives from the industry itself on the task force?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I read something about this in the mail this morning, that it was a reappointment or something like that.

In any case, the press release had today's date, I believe. I read the names in passing, I did not look at the release in detail. I had the impression there was someone representing the industry. I accept Senator Asselin's remark, since he read the release in greater detail than I did. I have made a note of the question and I will try to get some clarification.

[English]

Senator Asselin: I draw to the attention of the deputy leader that an article in the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, October 28, 1981, entitled "Textile Firms to Press for Place on Renewal Board," said that there were complaints from those companies to the effect that they were not represented on that board.

MANITOBA

PROPOSED SITE FOR INSTITUTE OF AEROSPACE TRAINING AND TECHNOLOGY

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. Again it has to do with western Canada. I should like to quote from a letter which is addressed to Manitoba senators particularly. The letter originates from the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce and clearly sets out the problem with which Manitobans have to come to grips once again. I should like to read an excerpt from the letter which explains the situation. I would appreciate it if you, as deputy leader, or the government leader, would give us an answer, tomorrow if not tonight, so that we may be in a position to enlighten our people in Manitoba as soon as possible.

[English]

This letter is signed by Jack Hignell, President of the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce. The letter is addressed to the various senators from Manitoba. Mr. Hignell stated in that letter:

As you are most likely aware, the federal government announced earlier this year that they had decided to establish a Canadian Institute of Aerospace Training and Technology in Winnipeg.

Since that announcement, publicity has been centred on disagreements between the Federal Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, and Quebec Members of Parliament, over the site of the Institute.

I need not go any further in quoting from that letter, honourable senators, because, after the announcement had been made with respect to the implementation of this large training school in Manitoba, it seems as though the matter has come to a standstill. There are many rumours out west that we will lose this just as we did the Viscount base of Air Canada in 1969. That proved to be a disaster to the city of Winnipeg. It lost over $100 million in revenue per year because of that

[Senator Asselin.]

I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to look into this matter. I can assure him that not only the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce is concerned, but also people from Winnipeg, Manitoba and also Saskatchewan, because this will affect the training program for many people from Saskatchewan who will benefit from it. Therefore, there are two provinces that are very concerned about the decision that was announced. People were led to believe that they were going to get it, and now there are rumours that that is not going to be the case. Can we be informed as to where this Institute of Aerospace Training and Technology will be established; whether it will be in Winnipeg, as was announced in the first place?

• (2110)

Hon. Martial Asselin: It will go to Montreal.

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take note of the question and if it is possible to inform Senator Guay in that respect, it will be done. If, on the other hand we can make a clear announcement right away, we will do so.

Senator Asselin: Look at the situation in Montreal as well.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

PETRO-CANADA—RETAIL SALES PRACTICES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government, not because I think he will be able to answer it immediately but because he is the only representative of the government that I see to whom to address a question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): There is nobody else.

Senator Smith: It relates to the retail enterprise of that crown corporation which is sometimes known as Petro-Canada and, particularly, its retail practices in connection with the retail gasoline outlets which it has acquired from Petrofina. What is the policy of Petro-Canada now with reference to permitting the sale in its retail stations of goods, aside from gasoline, which are normally sold in such stations? In particular, has that company a policy which prohibits its agents or representatives operating independent stations in Nova Scotia—independent in the sense that the dealer is also the owner of the premises—from selling Michelin tires?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a very clear question. I do not know whether I could give a clear answer, but I will certainly try to find one.

Senator Flynn: As a supplementary question, I would like to know the policy of those stations with regard to the price of gasoline. Are we going to pay the same price as in any other service station?

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Competitive.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Competitive.

Senator Asselin: More.

Senator Flynn: Competitive in what sense?

Senator Asselin: Higher.

Senator Flynn: Would they charge less? Senator Hastings is suggesting a reply for you.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I heard two of our distinguished western senators, who have some experience with Petro-Canada, both come up spontaneously with the word "competitive." I will see if I can find some justification for that in the policy of the corporation.

Senator Flynn: I want to know if it applies in both cases.

Senator Frith: I appreciate that the questions in both cases, I believe, are meant to apply to eastern Canada because that is where the Fina operation—

Senator Steuart: You have to make a buck somewhere.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I could report to my honourable friend that in the city of Winnipeg the prices are the same in normal trade—

Senator Flynn: That is competitive.

Senator Roblin:—except when there is some sort of price war going on. I want my honourable friend to tell me whether or not this arranged price, which is the same in all the filling stations in which PetroCan takes part, has been referred to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to see whether it violates any of the canons of the law.

Senator Steuart: They do it the same as the banks—by osmosis.

Senator Flynn: I would believe you.

Senator Roblin: The banks don't do it by osmosis. They are directed by the Bank of Canada to do these things.

Senator Frith: It depends on what things you are talking about.

Honourable senators, another distinguished western senator has given us his interpretation of the word "competitive." I will see if I can get a competitive interpretation from Petro-Canada.

THE ECONOMY

EXTENSION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, but since there is a very important cabinet meeting going on I can understand why he is not present. Therefore, I would like to direct my question to the Deputy Leader of the Government. As Senator Frith probably knows, the government's Small Business Development Bond program is due to expire at the end of this year. I ask him to take notice of this question and get a reply as soon as possible: Could he give assurance to the thousands of Canadian small businessmen and businesses, which are nearly crippled, even with the bond program, that the government will extend it beyond the year-end at which time it expires?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, without accepting the understandably rhetorical words in which the question is couched, or I think it is clear, namely: Will the program be extended or not? I will try to get that information.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, entitled: "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Bell).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understood that Senator Bell—and she will correct me if I am wrong—was standing this order in order to give other senators an opportunity to speak to it. I know of another senator who wants to speak to it in the week commencing November 22. If no other senator wants to speak to it this week, perhaps it can be allowed to stand until next week. Am I correct in thinking that Senator Bell is holding this order in the event that other honourable senators will speak to it?

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, in July I had asked to speak to this order because at that time I thought Senator Bonnell would be closing the debate, but then I noticed it was adjourned in the name of Senator McGrand. I then discussed it with Senator Bird, and we thought that it probably would be a good idea to have this matter raised in the fall, so that some action could be taken on the report. However, I would like to speak to it on Thursday, but I hope honourable senators will feel free to participate in the debate without consulting me.

Senator Frith: In that case, honourable senators, we will stand the matter because we know Senator Bell wishes to speak to it on Thursday, and another senator wishes to speak to it later.

Order stands.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

MEETING OF SUBCOMMITTEE RESPECTING WHEAT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition) rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, October 27, 1981:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the meeting of the Sub-Committee of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group respecting wheat, held in Washington, D.C., U.S.A., on October 23rd and 24th, 1981.

He said: Honourable senators, I am loath to disturb the even tenor of the way we are proceeding tonight by venturing to offer a few comments on the topic which I placed on the order paper the other day, but perhaps this represents an opportunity to deal with the subject in question.

I would like to begin by offering a word of appreciation—perhaps it might be more of a tribute—to the Honourable Hartland de M. Molson who has, for a number of years, been the leader of the Canadian Senate Delegation to the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group at its various meetings. Senator Molson has conducted himself with great distinction. He has offered wise counsel to those of us who have taken part in the proceedings of that body, and has reflected credit not only on himself but also on this chamber in the manner in which he has discharged his responsibilities. Incidentally, he told us, in the course of his speech, that perhaps he will not be discharging that function any more because his term of office has expired. If I had my way, I would have him continue in that role indefinitely, because he fills it very well indeed.

Speaking the other night about the main meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, he made mention of the attitude of our American guests at Halifax last summer. It is interesting that he was able to circulate among some of us extracts from the proceedings of the American House of Representatives, in which two of the delegates to our Halifax meetings spoke about Canadian-American relations. One was the Honourable D. B. Fascell and the other was the Honourable John LaFalce. They spoke to their American colleagues after the meeting in Halifax, and I thought it might be of some interest to honourable senators if I quoted a paragraph from Dante Fascell's speech, because it presents, in clear and understanding terms, the idea of the Canadian-American relationship which we might do well to keep in mind. Part of his speech went as follows:

Let our message to our Canadian friends be that we value their friendship, understand their concerns, and will work together to resolve or alleviate their grievances; and let that message also make clear we will look for a like attitude from them, so that their undoubted right to define and pursue their national interests will not impinge on our no less legitimate rights under international law.

I consider that to be a fair statement of an attitude that I hope will always prevail between our two countries when there are matters of mutual concern and perhaps disagreement to discuss.

When Senator Molson spoke the other day, he referred to the fact that there is a subcommittee of the main body which is studying the question of grain export marketing. As he forecast in his speech, that subcommittee did meet in Washington on October 23 and 24, and it is about the proceedings of that subcommittee that I wish to offer a few comments tonight.

Senator Sparrow and Mr. Jack Murta, M.P. were co-chairmen of the Canadian section. There were six members of the House of Commons, plus myself and the two gentlemen I mentioned. We met with six members of the United States Congress. It is perhaps interesting to reflect on the fact that of all the many matters of mutual concern which are at issue between our two countries at present, the subject of grain marketing, particularly wheat export grain marketing, happily is one of the subjects on which Canadian-American interests can be described as being sensibly harmonious.

It is a pleasant change from the differences of opinion which now beset a number of issues that are at stake between us. On the question of export of wheat, and in agricultural matters generally, I am pleased to report that we broadly speak to the same brief. That is particularly true in the case of wheat. Of course, it is quite natural because we proceed along decidedly parallel lines, for the reason that we share common problems and have common objectives in opening up markets for wheat. We find that there appears to be room for helpful co-operative action between our two nations in this important matter.

Canadians and Americans are major players in the world wheat export market. The supporting cast includes the Australians, the people of the Argentine and the European Economic Community. In both Canada and the United States wheat exports are a highly significant factor, not only in our regional interests but also in our national interests, because in both countries they make an enormous contribution to the balance of payments and our credibility in the world's economic structure.

During the course of the meetings there were some interesting discussions on matters of mutual interest. For example, we examined the cost of production of wheat. There are substantial similarities in the cost of production of wheat in our two countries, which is not surprising because we do share a continental agricultural economic system in this industry. We were able to compare prices and figures and find that there is a significant convergence in the costs of production between our two nations.

Wheat farmers in each country face similar production problems. They can be described in a phrase that will be familiar to any westerner in this chamber, namely the cost-price squeeze. That is a shorthand system that we in the west have used for a long time to indicate that the cost of producing wheat had been rising faster than the selling prices offered in the international export markets. Of course, the reasons for that are the same reasons that beset other aspects of our economy: the tremendous increase in interest rates, increasing cost of inputs—particularly those connected with energy, fertilizer and equipment. The price of land has been extremely buoyant indeed, with the result that there has been an increase in the cost of production which exceeds the increases that have been available in the world markets.

To some members of this committee it appeared also that there were imperfections in that world wheat export market, because those imperfections are reflected in the price of wheat in the Chicago market, which, in effect, settles the price of wheat for the world market. We find that there are certain constraints on that market that we would like to see eliminated. Some could be identified with the policies followed by other countries.

I need only mention the common agricultural policy that is being followed in the European Economic Community, and the effect that has on agricultural exports generally and on wheat in particular. This is important because in many years the European Economic Community makes a substantial contribution to the world wheat trade on a highly subsidized and preferential basis.

The same can be said for the Japanese—not that they export wheat, but they do import it. They have domestic price support systems which we feel impinge unfairly on the international price and thus affect the cost-price squeeze that I mentioned.

Then there is, of course, the extremely businesslike and capitalistic approach employed by the centrally planned economies in dealing with the Chicago market. I should say, to those who are not up to date on their jargon, that “centrally planned economies” means the Soviet Union and those countries like it. We find that their activities, particularly over the last four or five years, have been the cause of perceived unfairness in the establishment of world wheat export prices. Yet in our committee we came to the conclusion that if the conditions were favourable, both countries have a potential to significantly increase their production of wheat for export, and in that way make a major contribution to meeting the needs of the undernourished quarters of the world.

The meeting reviewed the supply and demand outlooks, both on the short-term and medium-term bases, and it found in those prospects a challenge to which we could respond to improve food supplies throughout the world—although it was pointed out, and I certainly agree with the observation, that this task of feeding the world is certainly not one for the agricultural community alone in either country, but is one which belongs to the whole national society in either case.

The conclusion was—and it will surprise no one—that the basic problem identified was to secure prices for producers that would meet the cost of production, and that this particular aspect of the grain marketing situation in the international field today was the point at which we should concentrate our efforts.

I will not detain honourable senators by recounting some of the interesting ideas that were put forward, by which the cost of production could be more faithfully reflected in world wheat prices. Some of those ideas have been discussed on the floor of the American House of Representatives, and while they have not been adopted by that chamber, they are gaining increasing support and popularity. But based on the general theme that our interests were in many cases parallel and comparable, that we were looking for a cost of production export price formula that would be more practical and favourable than the one we have today, the meeting came to a conclusion, supported by a broad consensus of those present, that we should call upon our respective legislatures—

Senator Frith: That is the meeting of the U.S.-Canada group, not a meeting of the House of Representatives.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry. I must be clear about that. I am talking about the subcommittee.

Senator Frith: It was not my wish to argue. I was not sure what you meant.

Senator Roblin: The subcommittee called upon the respective legislatures to establish a committee in each country with a mandate to develop specific proposals for improving producer returns, including a common floor price that at the minimum reflects the cost of production. I would make an addition to that, namely, that we should examine also ways and means of making it possible for the people who want to eat this wheat to buy it, because that, surely, must be one of the important components of any improvement in the international wheat trade.

Following the meeting, the Canadian delegation made it clear that it intended to follow up that initiative by asking the Canadian government to create a special joint Senate-Commons parliamentary task force on international wheat with a view to looking into the questions that had been raised. I believe that a meeting will be held this week with the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board to see whether his support can be obtained for a measure of this kind.

I have only skimmed lightly over a very large, important and difficult topic, but perhaps I have said enough to make it perfectly clear that the goals this committee has set for itself are decidedly ambitious, because when you are dealing with the question of the price of a commodity like wheat in the world market, it is no easy project to get a handle on it. It will require not only activity on the part of the Canadians and the Americans, but also the co-operation of other world exporters. Just as importantly, it will require the understanding and co-operation of the consuming nations of the world, so that they may have it made clear to them that this is no cartel or price ramp that people have in mind.

If we are able to make any progress along these lines, it could quite well be possible to maximize Canadian production, and improve the use of Canadian natural resources in providing something that the world needs badly, and in greatly increasing quantities as time goes by—namely, food to keep life in the bodies of people in unfortunate parts of this world.

This policy could lead to the possibility of reducing malnutrition around the world and making it possible for this great product of the agricultural industry in our two countries to play a greater role in the sphere of dealing with hunger and poverty throughout the world.

I have merely sketched the outlines of the question. To repeat what I have already said, it is by no means obvious what solutions will work in this case. We know what we would like to do, we have an idea of some of the problems, we can see the goals, we can see the possibilities. We are not sure how to achieve our goals, but we hope that if we can persuade the executive branches of the governments in both our countries to instruct the legislatures to seize themselves of the essence of this problem, then we can refine the matter; we can find out whether it is possible to do anything along these lines at all. If it is not, then we can go out and look for more suitable targets and opportunities; but if it is, then we can probably set the wheels in motion to get better supplies of food to the people of the world, and at the same time maximize the economic opportunities and economic contributions that the agricultural industry can make to the welfare of our country.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before adjourning the debate, in case Senator Argue, in particular, might want to make some comments, I wonder if the Honourable Senator Roblin can tell me about how much room to manoeuvre there is for Canada and the United States, in general, against the background of what I understand is a part of the situation, and about which I may be wrong, because I am no expert on this at all. Am I right that there is no straight counterpart in the United States of the Canadian Wheat Board? That is my first question.

The second question is this. I seem to remember reading somewhere about a very large private company, owned by a family, that has a good deal of control over international wheat. Am I confused with some other fields, or is that true? If I am right on the fact that there is no counterpart of the Canadian Wheat Board in the United States, and also on the other point, then I suppose that is going to be a part of the questions that Senator Roblin has still reserved in saying that what we have to do is find out how much we can do. Am I right about that setting?

Senator Roblin: The question of supply management in both countries has been exhaustively studied by this committee on previous occasions; but I think it is fair to say that, until we started to look into it, the American side of the equation had grave reservations about anything that would increase Canadian competition, in their view, in the international market. We were able to point out to them that up to the present time our capacity to sell had been limited by the transportation system; but we are no longer content to take that as a permanent limiting factor in our wheat trade, and we told them frankly that we expected in the next 10 years to increase the trade in grains by about 50 per cent. I think we can. We pointed out to them, however, that under the Canadian Wheat Board system we have a machine available now which, in effect, may not control production but which controls the supply that goes forward to the market, because under the quota system the Wheat Board calls forward the supplies that it can sell, and the supplies it cannot sell remain on the farm at the farmer's expense. The only help the farmer gets—"only" may be the wrong word—the only major assistance he gets is a cash advance towards grain, which amounts to $15,000 per farm. This is just a bag of shells—peanuts—because it really does not help very much. Cash flow problems are one of the main inhibiting factors in Canadian Wheat Board production these days, in my opinion, and that is something that will have to be tackled.

We therefore told them that on our side we were certainly intending to compete and that we had a machine that would enable the Canadian co-operative authorities under the Wheat Board to regulate the amount of grain that goes into the market. I will come to the question of price competition in a minute.

On their side they have, in effect, some indirect controls, or indirect influences, on the supply of wheat that their system can generate. They do not have anything like the Canadian Wheat Board, but they have a system like "set asides". If they think there is going to be too much grain grown in the United States, they have a system whereby they encourage farmers to set aside a certain acreage to summer fallow, or pasture, or some improving regime, rather than plant it to wheat. That has the effect of keeping the production of wheat down. The incentive is that if they stipulate that a set-aside situation exists, and if farmers want all the other helps that they have in their system, they do not get them unless they agree to go in on the set-aside.

They also have a system of keeping grain on the farm: They have a price that they will pay to the farmer for storing grain there, and a price at which it is released into the system; so they can keep grain out of the world export system by means of this farm storage arrangement.

There is another system that involves a target price, which is, in effect, a deficiency payment.

Although they do not have nearly as quick acting or direct a system of influencing the flow of grain into the market system as we have here, they are not without weapons. They have a system which has some reasonable effect.

Senator Frith: And which would enable them to implement any co-operative arrangement.

Senator Roblin: Yes, or if it does not, they would have to think about something else.

Realistically, however, things being what they are in the United States, there is no use expecting them to have a wildly interventionist policy with respect to agriculture. That is just not in the cards. We therefore have to make use of these other policies, which are reasonably effective, and which I myself would have no trouble living with.

They suspect that if we get the chance we will go out and underbid them. They set the price up, but they fear that we will go out and underbid them. Well, that is a myth. It is very hard to get it out of their minds, but that is not what history shows. If that is the way we operate we are damned poor competitors, because our share of the world market has been relatively static for 20 years, while their share of the world market has increased by over 50 per cent. It has gone up enormously, while ours has been static. So, if we are tough competitors by underselling them in the marketplace in terms of price, it does not show up in the results we see before us.

In fact, the Canadian Wheat Board has assured me, and I have reason to rely on their statement, that they simply take the American price, which is the basic price at which wheat is sold in the world market today. The Americans are the price setters. We told them frankly, "We have very little to do with price. We cannot control it. You are the price setters," and in effect the Chicago wheat market sets the price of wheat all over the world. Everybody in the whole system operates in connection with that.

On the question of supply, therefore, it is an "iffy" question, and you would have to see what hangs on it before you would put the stamp of approval on it. The question of price, I think, is really a non-starter in terms of being a problem. I think when the price is set by the Americans in the Chicago exchange, that is the price for the whole world.

The substance of your question, I take it, is: Is it possible to conceive of any arrangement of the sort I have been describing, working? I think it is. It is not going to be easy, and we are a long way from having achieved what we want; but I think it is well worth having a good look at it.

Senator Frith: And with regard to the other aspect, what you have said answers it to a large extent. That combination—the mechanisms and the production power—that the United States has, sets the price, and therefore the other aspect of the question, namely, whether the international private sector—monopolies or control mechanisms—would have too much power to let the two governments influence the situation, is not true.

Senator Roblin: It is true if you just contemplate proceeding along the same lines as we are proceeding along now. The big international grain companies—I believe there are about five of them—really do handle a great deal of the international trade of wheat in the United States. They are not concerned so much with price; they are concerned with the spreads. They live on the spreads, which are about the same no matter what the price is. You can see, therefore, that there is not exactly a common interest there.

Among some of the plans that have been discussed by the Americans, however, is one that recognizes this question. A mechanism by which this problem in their market is taken care of has been suggested by Mr. Weaver, a representative from Washington or Oregon. It is true, therefore, that the present market structure probably would cause difficulties, but there is no reason why there cannot be an intermediary machine which he described for us, actually, at our meeting by which this factor could be taken care of. He has been presenting this idea of his to the American House of Representatives for the past number of years. Though his proposal did not have any support when he started, it recently came pretty close to passing, so you never know.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Roblin a question simply for information, and it is with respect to another competitor on the world scene. I am speaking of what I believe he referred to as the centrally planned economies, which would be the Soviet bloc countries. As I understand it, he suggested there was perceived unfairness in the market. Could he enlarge on that and perhaps give some examples of it?

Senator Roblin: Surely. It was in 1974 that the Russian traders were able to get millions of bushels out of the American market simply by concealing the facts of their situation in Russia, and by going through every nook, cranny and back alley to negotiate deals.

The result of this was what has been called "The Great Grain Giveaway". They bought grain from the United States at prices that were really hundreds of millions of dollars less than what would have been paid in a freely operating trade situation. That is, I think, a fairly good example of what has been happening in the grain trade.

Even today when the Russians are out buying wheat—and I do not say this by way of criticism; they are pretty smart—they do not go to the United States first. The Russians make the Americans the supplier of last resort. They go to everybody else, and they do not get into the American pricing system if they can help it. They keep the pressure down on the American pricing system. If the Russians went into Chicago right away for all of their trade, that would have the effect of raising the price higher than it would otherwise be.

When I talk about "perceived unfairness" in the marketing system, perhaps "unfairness" is the wrong word to use. Perhaps the Russians were simply smarter than the Americans in this case. I am confident that the Hansard of this Senate would not be read in the United States, or I would not make that remark. It is likely, however, that the Russians outsmarted the Americans in those two instances.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 4, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HONOURABLE THÉRÈSE F. CASGRAIN

TRIBUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I apologize for my absence from the chamber yesterday. There were, however, mitigating circumstances. A meeting of cabinet was held at eight o'clock last evening, and it was rather important for all members to be in attendance. For that reason, I was not able to add my voice to the eloquent tributes paid to the late Madame Thérèse Casgrain, our former colleague, and to the Honourable John Connolly on his resignation from the Senate. May I then, at this time, take the opportunity to say a few words regarding these two great and distinguished Canadians?

[Translation]

It is with great sadness that I heard of the death of the Honourable Thérèse Casgrain.

I knew Senator Casgrain when I was a member of the House of Commons, and for seven years I had the pleasure of knowing her both personally and through her work.

[English]

Honourable senators, in recent hours many eloquent and heartfelt tributes to the late Senator Casgrain have been voiced in this chamber and elsewhere. While I was not a long-time personal friend of Thérèse Casgrain, I had regular opportunities to discuss with her the problems relating to Parliament and those affecting our nation. She was, of course, a person of incredible creative energy who could have served in the Senate with great ability beyond the compulsory retirement age of 75 years.

She had a vision of a united Canada, a vision of a democracy, not a nation where majority rights are imposed but where minority rights are protected. She was a person with a love for all of Canada, a love which encompassed not only her native province, but an affection which reached both of Canada's oceans—she visited the west coast and the east coast on several occasions—and an affection which encompassed all of the area and the peoples between.

Honourable senators, not long ago some of us saw her on television where she discussed her career and told us of her life, and all of the events in which she was involved during that great life. On that telecast we saw her with a vitality, the same vitality which she brought to this chamber for an all too brief time and to the noble causes she fought for all her life. I think she demonstrated this on the occasion of her retirement from the Senate when she said:

I wish to assure you that you can always count on me to stand up and be counted. We are living in times that are not easy, especially down our way. I think it would be awful if I had to go home and knit, because I would be sure to drop too many stitches.

Needless to say, honourable senators, she did not return home to knit. She was still standing up to be counted as recently as a few weeks ago, and made it abundantly clear that she felt she still had much work to do. Indeed, her contribution to the development of this nation will not soon be forgotten, especially her accomplishment in the field of women's rights. We have lost a great colleague, a great friend and a great Canadian.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I wish to take this opportunity to extend my most sincere sympathy to the Casgrain family.

[Later:]

[English]

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I, too, wish to pay tribute to the late Honourable Thérèse F. Casgrain.

I knew Madame Casgrain when she used to come to Ontario to speak on behalf of the poor and unfortunate. At that time, we were both considered to be left wingers. When she came to Ontario to speak on welfare matters, I got to know her quite well. She always had time to devote to the less fortunate in our society.

I wish to say something in particular about the late Senator Casgrain. She had a special spot in her heart for the Jews of Quebec. She not only expressed that, but gave them whatever assistance she could on many occasions. I wish to thank her for that, and to express my sympathy to her family.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN J. CONNOLLY, P.C.

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION FROM SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to pay this necessarily delayed tribute to one of our most eminent colleagues, a man who served in this chamber for over 28 years. I am speaking, of course, of the Honourable John Connolly, who officially retired last Saturday, October 31, on his seventy-fifth birthday. Senator Connolly wrote to me the other day. He stated that he would find it very difficult to be in the chamber to hear the tributes to him on the occasion of his retirement. However, I hope that he will learn of these tributes in either recorded or written form. They may serve to assure him of the affection and esteem in which he is held by all of us.

A distinguished jurist, Senator Connolly has served this country in many different capacities, giving a great many people the benefit of his experience and expertise.

Senator Connolly first started serving this country as the executive assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services during the war years. He also served as president of the National Liberal Federation and of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

Aside from Senator Connolly's interest in and contribution to national affairs, he has always shown an interest in the welfare of young people. In this capacity, John Connolly served as a professor of philosophy at the University of Notre Dame early in his career and later served as president of the English Catholic Education Association of Ontario.

As a member of numerous Senate standing committees and parliamentary delegations, John Connolly was always a source of friendship and advice to anyone who approached him. He was a great parliamentarian, in the best sense of the term. His efforts on behalf of Parliament—both the Senate and the other place—were not bound by narrow partisan considerations. He had friends in all parties and recognized that a parliamentary system must include good people of every political philosophy. He was a passionate advocate of the parliamentary system and political involvement. As I have said, as a member of numerous Senate standing committees and parliamentary delegations he has been a source of friendship and advice for hundreds of us. He is a wise person. I have sought his advice frequently, and I shall continue to do so. A former Leader of the Government in this place, John Connolly has always been a special source of help to all of us who have occupied this position, just as he has been of help to opposition leaders. Certainly, he has been unstinting in his help to me from the very time I was asked to become Leader of the Government in the Senate.

It is ironic that Senator Connolly has retired on his seventy-fifth birthday, he being a life senator. However, John Connolly has always led by example and he decided, on the occasion of introducing the bill providing for the retirement of senators, to set the example himself, opting many years ago for retirement at this time.

I join with others of all political persuasions in this chamber to wish John Connolly and his wife the very best during the coming years. He has been a good friend to all of us. Perhaps at some time in the future we will have the wisdom to create the post of "senator emeritus" so those outstanding senators who are required to retire can continue to serve their country and the parliamentary system. Senator Connolly would qualify, without any question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): And Senator Forsey.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honorable senators, I cannot offer the same excuse as the Leader of the Government offered for not participating in these tributes earlier. I was somewhat taken aback by the spontaneously fine speeches made by the leaders in this chamber. On an occasion such as this, I would have thought that we would have been notified in advance that this chamber would be devoting some time to paying tribute to Senator Connolly; then anyone who so wished could have taken a few minutes to prepare to participate. I hope that some notification will be given in the future, since other instances such as this will arise.

I associate myself with the tributes that were paid yesterday. I am glad that John Connolly set the example for retiring at age 75, since I was not in the mood.

I knew John Connolly before we both came to the Senate. He was very much respected and liked for his sense of kindness and understanding. By exhibiting and expressing his best attributes, he was an inspiration to all of us. He showed leadership in this chamber and was most productive. His mind was never closed to new ideas or to new methods. The Senate should remember that he was the architect of studies by special Senate committees. He encouraged that. Honourable senators may note that the House of Commons has adopted that approach, and it has proved to be as effective there as it is here.

I recall one incident when we were in opposition. There were only eight or nine senators of the government party at that time, it being a Conservative government. A highly technical bill came before the Senate. None of us understood it very well, although we tried to, but when the government put the bill before us, John Connolly stood up and introduced it.

Senator Flynn: That was in 1957.

Senator Croll: He introduced the bill and led us through it on second and third readings. I can think of no such instance having occurred in the other place, where a member of the opposition introduced a bill that was ultimately passed.

Senator Flynn: There was no place where the opposition was so much stronger in numbers than the government.

Senator Croll: In any event, he made a worthwhile contribution to the Senate. It is noted; it is recorded; and he will be remembered for that. I wish him a long and happy retirement, and to his wife and two sons I extend my good wishes.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

RIDLEY ISLAND—COAL LOADING FACILITY—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to make a brief statement, and distribute copies of a document which contains information respecting a decision that was made by cabinet on Friday last relating to the Ridley Island coal loading facility just south of Prince Rupert on the west coast.

I should like permission to have it printed as an appendix to today's Hansard, because there are many people in this country who are interested in the details of the proposal that was approved by cabinet. If it meets with the agreement of senators opposite, I will read just the essential parts of the document into the record now. They are as follows:

OTTAWA, October 30, 1981—Senator H.A. (Bud) Olson, Minister of State for Economic Development, Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin, Senator Ray Perrault and Senator Jack Austin, B.C. representatives in the Federal Cabinet, reaffirmed today that the federal government will fulfil its commitment to build a public access coal terminal facility on Ridley Island.

The Ministers expressed regret that Teck Corporation, Quintette Coal Limited and a Consortium comprised of Federal Commerce and Navigation Ltd., Gulf Resources Inc., Esso Resources Canada Ltd. and Manalta Coal Ltd. have been unable to reach agreement on financial arrangements for operation of the coal terminal.

"We made a firm commitment last February to have the coal port constructed and ready to receive the first shipments of coal from the two coal producers' mines, scheduled to arrive at the port in the Fall of 1983," the Ministers said. "Failure of the coal companies and the Consortium to reach agreement in time for the federal government to meet its commitment for the port's construction threatened to jeopardize this major economic development opportunity for British Columbians and all Canadians. It was imperative that the federal government step in and take direct action to ensure that all of its commitments associated with the development of the North East B.C. coal block are honoured and, in particular, to ensure that port construction proceeds on a critically tight schedule to meet the coal companies' shipping requirements" the Ministers added.

Over the past weeks, the Ministers and officials of the National Harbours Board have made every effort to bring interested parties together to facilitate an agreement so that port construction can proceed on schedule. Lengthy discussions were held with all interested parties to determine the best possible arrangement to ensure that fundamental objectives of the federal government were met for the port's development and operation. These objectives, which the federal government has consistently adhered to throughout the negotiations are to ensure that:

- all shippers, present as well as future coal shippers in B.C. and other parts of western Canada, have fair and equitable access to the port;
- all shippers be provided fair and equitable rates for shipping coal through the port;
- the port operates on a developmental basis until April 1989 and thereafter on a commercial basis; and that
- while ensuring commercial port operation, the best possible rate post April 1989 be available to all coal shippers.

The Ministers announced that after careful exploration of various alternatives, the National Harbours Board will enter into an agreement with Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited for the design, construction and operation of a coal terminal facility on Ridley Island. The NHB and Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited will jointly undertake to form a corporation. The NHB will assume a 90 per cent equity position in the corporation and Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited will assume the remaining 10 per cent equity position.

The federal government will initially guarantee loans from financial institutions for 80 per cent of the financial requirements of the corporation with the remaining 20 per cent to be equally shared by the NHB and Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited. The NHB share will be approximately $23 million. It is expected that the loan guarantee arrangement will be interim and replaced by throughput contracts for coal.

"We are confident that through this arrangement fair and equitable access and fair and equitable rates to all shippers will be achieved. In addition the interim federal loan guarantee will assure timely construction of the port and provide the best possible rate for all coal shippers. The new corporation will pass on the benefits to be derived from the Government guarantee and a lower return on equity participation in the form of lower throughput rates to all coal shippers after 1989", the Ministers said.

I ask permission to have printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate the whole of this document, the last five and a half pages of which outline in some additional detail what the arrangements will be, and what the federal government's participation will be in this major economic expansion activity. If honourable senators agree, then I will just say one or two further words about why it was necessary for us to move on this at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: In conclusion—and I will be very brief—we made a commitment that we would see to it that the port was ready. The Government of British Columbia gave an undertaking that they would do all things such as design, engineer, build and pay for the railroad, the townsite and those infrastructural requirements needed in the interior.

● (1425)

The British Columbia government is now in the position of having called tenders for some major sections of the railway—that is, for the tunnels—amounting to more than $100 million, and perhaps nearly $200 million. It was necessary for us, therefore, to state firmly that we stand behind the commitment we made last February that the port would be ready by the end of 1983. Despite concentrated negotiations that have been going on for five or six months to get the commercial companies involved to sign an agreement, and therefore to proceed with the actual physical construction, that, unfortunately, did not materialize. However, we as a government, believed that our commitment to British Columbia, so they could proceed with the construction of the railroad, was vital and, therefore, we had to undertake this action so that all matters related to the operation—the stocking, piling, reclaiming and loading of the coal on the ships—will be completed.

Honourable senators will note that we have already given a commitment with respect to whatever it costs—probably $30 million or $40 million—for site preparation, building the causeway and putting in other infrastructure requirements that are preliminary to the coal operator's actually putting the machinery on the site. Because they were unable to have an agreement between the private sector companies involved, we have taken on that additional responsibility.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am much impressed with the sponsorship of this document which has been handed to us today. I notice that it is approved by and vouched for by no less than four members of the cabinet—

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: A high level of co-operation.

Senator Roblin:—all of whom are described as B.C. representatives in the federal cabinet. Probably the editor should get busy on that and make a correction. How the Honourable Senator Argue escaped the honour of being included in that quartet, I really do not know, because in view of his interest in Prince Rupert and the movement of grain through that port, they might have done him the courtesy of including him too. However, they have included him out, and we shall just have to make the best we can of that.

Senator Perrault: He was included when we announced the vast new grain terminal at Prince Rupert.

Senator Roblin: I am quite sure he is included in any possibility that could be thought of that would enhance the political image of my honourable friends opposite. I have no doubt about that whatsoever, and I congratulate them. I confess I am a little envious. I congratulate them on the efficiency with which they make clear that no stone is left unturned or PR flak uncaressed when it comes to getting the maximum publicity for the things they are doing. However, I want to ask some questions.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It takes one to know one.

Senator Roblin: That may be the case. I have to admit that I represent a group of people who perhaps are not nearly so successful at it as are my honourable friends opposite. I have to take my hat off to them; they do a better job.

I really should not allow myself to be distracted by the interventions of the Leader of the Government because they do not really add anything to the sum of human knowledge. I wish to get to the statement that was made today, and ask some questions about it. The first has to do with the nature of the negotiations with the parties. I see that a number of people were originally in this proposal, and that one of them alone—Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited—has entered into this arrangement with the government in which the greater portion of the capital is either guaranteed by the government or supplied by a government body. My question is: Were the same terms and conditions offered to other people to induce them to come into this operation?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is a simple answer to that question. There was no need for identical terms and conditions because we invited public tenders or proposals respecting a coal operator on the site. Four tenders came in, and that was back in April. I will get the exact date if the honourable senator wishes. The consortium whose proposal was accepted was composed of Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited, Esso Resources, Gulf Resources and Manalta. That is the consortium, but one of the requirements for us to sign a contract with them was to negotiate a throughput charge, and therefore get contracts for loading from the private companies who have that.

As I said in my opening comments, we were disappointed that they were unable to do that. What we do know is that that went on for several months, and it was necessary for us to meet our commitments to the British Columbia government and to all coal companies, and not only those that were directly involved to begin with. We had to take some action so that certain physical and financial arrangements that have to commence now could go ahead, so it is not really comparing the same things.

By the way, we will wind up with 90 per cent of the equity in this, which, of course, is in an amount equal to the amount of financial undertaking, and I should advise my honourable friend that that is not an ongoing subsidy, except to the extent that the rate on that financing could be somewhat lower than the other arrangements.

The fact is that they are not the same, but the company that was in there along with four others was, of course, adjudicated, if that is the right word, on the proposal they made.

Senator Roblin: I take it, from my honourable friend's response, that the answer is no.

Senator Olson: Well, it is like asking me if I have stopped beating my wife yet. The answer is no.

Senator Roblin: In other words, the answer is no. I am not asking you if you have stopped beating your wife. I do not even know if you are married.

In other words, I am entitled to say that the answer is no. I am glad to hear my honourable friend agree with me. The answer is no. He negotiated a separate agreement with this other company. I make no further judgment on that. I am just looking for the facts.

He partially answered some of my other inquiries about this matter. I wanted to ask about the debt-equity ratio. It is not stated here.

Senator Olson: Yes, it is.

Senator Roblin: Is it? If so, I missed it, and the minister can draw my attention to that. I am looking for a handle on the magnitude of this proposition. If the National Harbours Board has $23 million and 10 per cent, I take it the total debt cost of this is $230 million.

Senator Olson: That's about right.

Senator Roblin: If that is right, is the equity being distributed for nothing, or is somebody paying for that?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, if you will look at the details in the last three pages, under the heading: "Details of the Business Joint Undertaking Between the National Harbours Board and Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited," you will see it says it will be a joint undertaking. Paragraph 2 states:

The capital structure of the new Corporation will be composed of 80 per cent debt and 20 per cent equity. The NHB will assume a 90 per cent equity position in the Corporation, and Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited will assume the remaining 10 per cent equity position.

This is in direct relation to the financial commitment that they give.

Senator Roblin: My question is whether the equity is being paid for, or whether it is being distributed as part of the deal without any specific cash contribution attached.

Senator Olson: Yes, I understand that question. No. Both the National Harbours Board and Federal Commerce and Navigation Ltd. will be required to put up 10 per cent in the first instance, amounting to something like $23 million each.

Senator Roblin: But that is not equity capital; that is debt capital.

Senator Olson: That is equity capital. The equity will go in, and the joint venture corporation will borrow the other 80 per cent. That, of course, will have a federal government guarantee.

Senator Roblin: I thank my friend. That explains it clearly to me now.

I want to go on to the suggestion made in the statement that there will be certain benefits to be passed on to the users of this facility in terms of the difference between the market rate for debt money and the rate that the government guarantee will provide, which is fair enough. Can we make any guess as to what that might be, in terms of percentages? What would it be—one per cent or one and a half per cent? I am just guessing there.

● (1435)

I come then, however, to the question of a lower return on equity participation. Has some arrangement been made as to the rate of return to be allowed on the equity? Has that been fixed? If not, what is the meaning of the phrase "a lower return on equity participation"?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it becomes fairly complicated, but I think my honourable friend will realize, when there is 10 per cent or 20 per cent for the National Harbours Board and Federal Commerce and Navigation Ltd., that they are entitled to some return on investment. I think it is stated in here that the amount to the National Harbours Board would be somewhat lower than the commercial rate. A suggested amount is 18 per cent.

Senator Roblin: Where does that appear?

Senator Olson: If it does not appear in there, I will explain it now. I believe that, at the moment, a reasonable return on investment is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 20 per cent—so it is slightly lower. The other aspect that is extremely important is that the 80 per cent is perhaps non-recourse debt, a guarantee from the government. Therefore, it is the cost of that financing, not a return on it, that will be the basis for establishing throughput charges.

Senator Roblin: Yes, I understand that. I understand the minister to be telling us that the rate of return on the National Harbours Board equity will be 2 per cent less than the rate of return received by the other shareholder. Is there anything in the agreement about the ceiling on the rate of return? The rate of return depends upon what you earn, not upon what you would like to get. I want to know if there is anything in this arrangement that limits the rate of return on equity.

Senator Olson: I am not sure that there is a limit on that, except the undertaking that we intend it to be fair, equitable and reasonable. We have to have that much latitude, I think. With the involvement of an agency, if you like, of the federal government—namely, the National Harbours Board—I think my honourable friend can be assured that it will be fair and reasonable. For us to try to predict in perpetuity what the interest on funds may be would be playing a rather dangerous game.

Senator Roblin: It is not interest on funds that I have been talking about, it is the return on equity, which is something quite different, as my honourable friend knows. I am not going to ask the minister to explain anything more to me, but I leave him with that comment. What is the basis for the statement that there will be significant savings in a lower return on equity participation? Does the minister have something in his mind? Perhaps there is something in it, but it certainly does not emerge clearly from the document that is before us.

I would like to pass on to another point, which has to do with the fact that for the first few years of this plan I suppose a subsidy will be involved, because it is not until 1989 that the terminal moves over to commercial rates. Up until that time, there is a rate set with a ceiling of, I believe, $3 per tonne for the material moved through. The government, no doubt, has made a forecast of the financial structure of this and has determined whether there will be any element of subsidy during the period up to 1989. I am assuming there will be, and I think that is probably a fair assumption.

I am asking whether it is intended to recover that subsidy after 1989 when commercial rates come into force.

Senator Olson: The answer to your question is partially yes and partially no. I will explain that, if I may. There will be a significant amount of money allotted for site preparation that will be done by the National Harbours Board, which might amount to $35 or $40 million, or more. The National Har-bours Board will be provided with those funds by the Government of Canada, and there will be a rate of interest established at the date of disbursement. We have, however, given an undertaking that the rate will not be more than $3 per tonne, in 1980 dollars, escalated at 80 per cent of CPI until April 1989. We will recover all of those funds, and to do so we will set a charge, to become effective, and on which we will start collecting, after April 1989. To that extent, therefore, it will be full cost recovery. The period of disbursement is to be partly in 1981, but for the most part in 1982 and 1983. We have agreed not to collect interest on the funds until 1989.

● (1440)

To that degree, that amount of money will be a subsidy, if you wish to call it that. We prefer to call it a developmental incentive.

Senator Roblin: Fair enough.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Amendment to the document entitled "Initial Response of the Federal Government to the 'Obstacles' report", dated November 2, 1981, relating to the Report of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped, issued by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Report of the Auditor General to the Solicitor General on the examination of the accounts and financial statement of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (Dependents) Pension Fund for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 55(4) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, Chapter R-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Public Accounts of Canada, Volume II, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 55(1) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Doody be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Sherwood on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MANUFACTURING SECTOR—CABINET SUBCOMMITTEE DECISION

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development. The Minister of Finance assured Canadians on the weekend that the government is not planning to introduce, for the manufacturing sector, a Canadianization program similar to the National Energy Program. Mr. MacEachen said that this was a conclusion of the cabinet committee on economic development, which he headed and which was comprised of seven ministers hand-picked by the Prime Minister. Is this something different from the committee headed by Senator Olson, or has Senator Olson been pushed aside for that special purpose?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators. The committee my honourable friend is referring to is a subcommittee of the economic development cabinet committee.

Senator Flynn: Were you a member of the subcommittee?

Senator Olson: Yes, I was.

Senator Flynn: But not the chairman. When you are on the subcommittee, you lose your status.

Senator Olson: I was vice-chairman of the subcommittee.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURES—NUMBER OF SEATS—NEWSPAPER REPORT

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday I was amazed to read on page 8 of the Montreal Gazette an article entitled "Constitutional Chess Game has Three Main Elements." The three elements in question were: patriation, the amending formula, and the Charter of Rights.

Let me read part of what the article says under the subheading "Amending."

Under the interim formula, minor changes such as an increase in the number of seats in a provincial legislature could be made without unanimity.

I was puzzled when I read that—"in a provincial legislature". I thought, "My gosh! How could a writer come to the conclusion that a provincial legislature would require unanimity to change the number of seats in a provincial legislature?" I was certainly puzzled. Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could erase any doubts that I have as to the veracity of that statement, and, indeed, of the whole article based upon that paragraph.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I too, saw the article in the Gazette. I can only assume that it must have been a mistake by the writer of the article. Certainly, it is the general understanding that any adjustment in the number of seats in the provincial legislatures would be a matter coming within one of the classes of subjects under the B.N.A. Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is section 92.1.

YUKON TERRITORY NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

FEDERAL FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENT FORMULAS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to Senator Austin. Can the honourable senator explain why the Government of Canada has insisted on reaching a financial arrangement formula with the Northwest Territories before implementing the financial arrangement formula it has already agreed to with the Yukon Territory?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): I wish to thank Senator Balfour for his question. I must admit that I am unaware that the Government of Canada has accepted and implemented a formula with the Northwest Territories government. I will look into that matter and advise him further.

With respect to the Yukon government, there is a formula still under discussion. As recently as this morning the leader of the Yukon territorial government raised the matter with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I believe that matter will be given a degree of urgency in the next few weeks.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR SUPPORT IN AWARD OF SHIPBUILDING CONTRACTS

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I hope his colleagues from British Columbia will take note as well. My question arises from an article which appeared on the front page of the Montreal Gazette yesterday, stating "Montreal firm already winner in frigate program".

[Senator Robichaud.]

It has been my understanding that two consortia have been advanced federal moneys designated for the frigate program. One group of companies is led by the Saint John Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Co., Ltd. and the other by a company called SCAN Marine Inc. of Montreal.

Honourable senators, I wish to take this opportunity to thank the federal government for allocating, as it announced at the first of the week, moneys in the form of grants and loans to the Saint John Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company for the expansion of the dry dock facilities in Saint John. I feel I should point out to this house that the Saint John Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company is in fact the most modern shipbuilding and dry dock company in the country and competes quite successfully with even the largest firms outside the country.

I know that the decision on this matter has not yet been taken, but such matters have a tendency to proceed rather slowly and then, before we in Atlantic Canada know it, bang, a decision is made. I am sure that it is no surprise to honourable senators that often in cases where there is competition between Ontario or Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, the Atlantic provinces end up on the short end of the stick. While I can say that I have complete confidence in the ministers in the other place who represent the Atlantic provinces in the Government of Canada, there may come a time when they will need the assistance of their fellow ministers from the west, and it so happens that most of those ministers are in this place.

I would remind the members of the government in the Senate that if they peruse this article they will notice that at the present time the so-called second leader of the consortium is employing about 150 people in Montreal, whereas Saint John Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Co. Ltd., in Saint John, New Brunswick, usually employs about 1,500 to 2,500 people.

The point I really wish to make is that, if the Government of Canada really wishes to show that it is serious about doing something about regional disparities, this presents an opportunity to establish a major project on the east coast, in the province of New Brunswick, because the facilities, knowledge and experience can be found there.

After hearing the communiqué released today by the four ministers from western Canada with regard to the west coast, I hope that those four ministers will lend their support to the Atlantic region, and particularly to New Brunswick, as the location for performing this job.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate Senator Thériault's observations, containing, as they do, the usual wise dispensation of information. I think it can be said that Canadians are among the best shipbuilders in the world, whether those ships are built on the east coast, the west coast, or the St. Lawrence. Saskatchewan and Manitoba have yet to establish a reputation as major shipbuilders, but I am sure that if they had the water they would do well there also.

May I provide the assurance that regional considerations are taken into account when contracts are allocated, and that many of the consortia which bid on ship contracts are made up of various suppliers from many parts of the country. For example, it is not uncommon, as Senator Thériault may be aware, to have the ship designed in one part of Canada, some of the building done on the east coast or the west coast, and some of the components provided by factories in various parts of the country.

However, information will be sought with respect to the article which appeared in the newspaper which prompted Senator Thériault's concern. I want to provide, though, the additional assurance that those of us in government are fully aware of the magnificent shipbuilding capacity of the east coast and the Saint John shipyard.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, may I thank the Leader of the Government for his concern? I would remind him, once again, that in this case there are only two consortia. I realize that the major contracts, when let, could be spread out. I would remind the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and his cabinet colleagues as well, that when the contracts were let for the subcontracting of components for the F-18 fighter aircraft, none of them went to the Atlantic provinces. It seems to me, after what seems like almost 100 years of being around here, that when it comes to major projects the government, over the years, has not been disposed to believe that the work could be done in the Atlantic provinces. That is what I would like to change.

Senator Perrault: I believe that all honourable senators appreciate the very strong and outstanding advocacy for the needs of his region demonstrated by Senator Thériault.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LIMITATION OF PRODUCTION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government. It is prompted by the many poppies I see being worn in the chamber which evoke a sad but yet proud remembrance of those who were killed in the great wars. Let us also remember that since 1945, there have been some 140 more wars in the world, killing over 30 million people. My question is also prompted by the school children in the gallery and by my thoughts on the very moving peace portrayal given by school children from Montreal on Parliament Hill last week, particularly their shouted poignant message with reference to the nuclear bomb—"Can't you see that we want to live?" During that presentation a little boy portrayed a battlefield scene in which he saw his father killed. He cried out tragically, over and over again, "Daddy, get up!"

In view of the speech made by the Prime Minister to the United Nations General Assembly on May 26, 1976 entitled "Disarmament and the Problems of Organizing the World Community," in which he outlined four measures in order to, as he said, "develop a strategy of suffocation in the nuclear arms race," would the Leader of the Government report to us what progress, if any, in the view of the Canadian government, has been made on all or any of these measures, and what specifically are the initiatives by our Ambassador for Disarmament in order to achieve the adoption of any or all of these measures?

I would add a further question. In view of the newspaper reports on the progress made by Pakistan in developing a so-called "Muslim nuclear bomb" from our nuclear exports to that country, is the government considering adding more technical and institutional arrangements as safeguards to our commercial nuclear sales?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I believe that all honourable senators appreciate our people's concern regarding the desirability of achieving peace, as was demonstrated here by Senator Thompson, who surely reflects the views of most Canadians. Interestingly enough, I believe that today marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of the magnificent intervention by the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson in the Middle East conflict in 1956. It is one of the great examples of Canadian leadership to assure world peace.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: May I suggest that Canadians of all parties and all provinces can take pride in Canada's record in attempts to bind the wounds caused by war and to undertake initiatives to assure lasting peace.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

MINISTER'S ANNOUNCEMENT RE IMMIGRATION QUOTAS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my question is prompted by the announcement of the Minister of Employment and Immigration earlier in the week with regard to changes in the immigration quotas. I think it is clear that there is widespread Canadian approval of the revelation of continuing sensitivity toward the travails of the Polish people. However, on the other hand, we notice a decision to cut down significantly the number of people to be admitted from the area called Indochina, this despite the fact that there are many, many people there in refugee camps.

Further, I note the comment by the very devoted and learned authority, Mr. Hardy, the past chairman of the Board of Catholic Immigration Services, who fears that the Canadian decision to cut down the numbers will have a chain reaction, causing Thailand, Hong Kong and Malaysia to further reduce their quotas as well.

Unless the government knows of some amelioration of the condition, this is a very serious matter indeed, and I would ask the minister to advise us if the Government of Canada entered into discussions with any of the countries, such as the three I have mentioned, who are principally involved in the great tragedy of the refugees in that part of the world.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it should be placed on the record that Canada has been one of the most forthcoming nations in the entire world in its attitude towards assisting refugees. I know that Senator Macquarrie will agree with that statement.

In 1982, Canada plans to admit 14,000 refugees: 4,000 from Indochina; 6,000 from Eastern Europe; 1,000 from Latin America and the Caribbean; 500 from Africa; 400 from the Middle East; 100 from other world areas; and there will be a contingency reserve of 2,000. The numbers represent general targets and are flexible. Privately sponsored refugees or family reunification cases are admitted over and above the numbers in the plan. The contingency reserve permits response to unforeseen developments.

Honourable senators, I am sure, will take pride in the fact that, on a per capita basis, Canada resettles more refugees than any other country in the world.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Perrault: The ideal solution for most of the 10 million refugees in the world is repatriation or local integration. Resettlement is a solution of last resort. I believe that Senator Macquarrie agrees with the view that we do not necessarily provide the highest service to the refugee by bringing him or her to Canada, and that often we can provide an amelioration of conditions in some other part of the world to assist that person.

Canada stands among the leading nations in providing other kinds of tangible forms of relief outside of our own boundaries.

As far as Indochina is concerned, Canada remains committed to supporting countries of first asylum in Indochina. I mentioned the level of 4,000 Indochinese refugees to be admitted in 1982, which remains substantial and reflects the easing of crisis, which Senator Macquarrie asked about, and diminished numbers of refugees requiring resettlement outside the area.

The actual level admitted in 1982 will exceed the refugee plan level of 4,000 through private sponsorship and family reunification from Vietnam. Therefore, there will be others in addition to the 4,000.

Canada will continue to contribute to humanitarian assistance directed towards refugees in Indochina.

As far as Latin America and the Caribbean are concerned, the 1982 annual refugee plan level of 1,000 will respond to what we believe will be a relatively small flow of refugees produced from South America, and those refugees from Central America for whom local integration or eventual repatriation is not possible and who have a close connection with Canada. It is anticipated that this level will be sufficient to respond to this need.

Canada recently made a $500,000 special contribution to UNHCR programs for refugees in Central America, and has contributed $450,000 to ICRC programs in Central America.

All of these activities provide some of the reasons why Canada's reputation abroad, in this regard, stands second to none in the world today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am always grateful for the homilies that I get from the minister. I appreciate his intention of enlightening me. I am never satisfied that the best posture towards the problems of the international world is a sustained effort in horn blowing.

Of course, Canada is doing very well; nevertheless, the figures indicate that there are still at least 160,000 refugees from the area which was formally known as Indochina. We are reducing our annual figure to 4,000. I believe that the enormity of the problem remains. I was merely asking if we had ascertained that, in fact, there are moves in the world to diminish that figure of 160,000. I do not think the situation has been ameliorated.

I would be grateful if the minister, at some future time—and I do not expect him to have the information at hand—could indicate what are the government's plans with reference to the Somalia situation. This is one case in which the movement of people is not their goal at all, but assistance in their own terribly deprived and ravished area.

I know that, as an enlightened country in the international community, Canada is canvassing all these grave situations, knowing that that which touches the people living in Africa will, in the long run, affect us as well.

Senator Perrault: That question will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I have a supplementary question to put to the Leader of the Government. When the previous Conservative government agreed to allow 50,000 refugees into Canada from Vietnam, you may recall that there were large advertisements in newspapers paid for by the Citizens Coalition, headed by Mr. Colin Brown, predicting that as a result of allowing 50,000 refugees into Canada another 750,000 relatives would follow them on the basis of family reunification.

I remember that at that time I thought it a ridiculous statement and wrote a letter to the paper saying so.

Can you obtain for us figures indicating how many actually came in on the basis of family reunification?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would be pleased to seek that additional information. Perhaps it should be added that we do no service to refugees by bringing them to Canada if we cannot assure them a reasonable opportunity to work, support their families and provide a decent way of life for themselves. When we have high levels of unemployment in certain parts of this country, we must balance our commitment to the refugee problem against our commitment to the problems of Canadians who find themselves out of work. It is a difficult policy to evolve, but generally the Canadian government has done very well.

Hon. Robert Muir: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. When securing information for Senator Godfrey, would he secure the percentages of refugees from Indochina who have been accepted by Sweden, Norway, Denmark and the Soviet Union?

Senator Perrault: I would be pleased to provide that information. May I make the prediction that honourable senators will be quite proud of this nation's efforts in comparison with those of some other countries of the world?

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in view of Senator Perrault's statement regarding the policy preferring absorption of these refugees in other countries in the area, may I ask the Leader of the Government the particular countries he has in mind which would absorb the Indochinese, whether it is China, Laos, Cambodia, or Thailand?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—GRAIN PURCHASES—FINANCIAL LIABILITY

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development, in the absence of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

I think Canadians across the country have applauded Senator Argue's announcement that Canada is increasing, by $500 million, the credit terms it offers to Poland on grain purchases. I certainly endorse the concept of this humanitarian practice, as he called it.

My question is one that has been asked of me by farm representatives in Saskatchewan. In the event of non-payment or default by the Government of Poland, is it the Government of Canada which will pick up the loss, or will the farmers of western Canada have to pay for this through their Wheat Board payments?

We are applauding the deal, but in view of the financial position, the heavy external debt load of Poland, I would say that their credit is in a precarious position right now and that they may find it difficult to meet their international commitments.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the credit arrangements were arranged with the commercial banks, with the Government of Canada undertaking to guarantee them. While there have been no defaults, there have been some rearrangements of the repayment schedule. If there is a default, as suggested, the guarantee is made by the Government of Canada, and that means the whole Government of Canada.

TRANSPORT

PORTS OF HALIFAX AND SAINT JOHN—LOSS OF BUSINESS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. The question relates to sea traffic through the Port of Halifax and, in particular, that of Zim Israel Navigation Company, which is the largest remaining container service to the Port of Halifax. I ask him whether or not he is aware—or whether or not it is true, because I am not aware, so I am not telling him something but am asking him something—that Zim Container Service is considering moving its port of call from Halifax to New York.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

Senator Smith: I have a supplementary question. When he is considering the material he receives in answer to this question, I wonder if he would also consider whether or not this decision to change—if, in fact, there is such a decision, or intention, or consideration to change—is due to the increased CNR rates for carrying freight between Halifax and points in central Canada, such as Montreal and Toronto. I would expect him to keep in mind, if he would, that one of the great arguments in persuading various container companies to use Halifax as their port of call for this side of the ocean, and particularly Canada and the east coast, was that it was cheaper to pay the cost of moving container freight by rail to the markets of central Canada and the United States, as far west as Chicago, as opposed to the cost of financing a ship's extra journey to reach a port more distant from Europe.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take the latter comments that form a question into account and try to find that out as well. However, I want it to be understood that what the senator is asking is what is in the minds of the management or directors of the company. Therefore, what I will try to bring back to the Senate will clearly be their expressions and views.

Senator Smith: I understand that the minister is not a mind reader. If he had been, I am sure some things that have happened would not have happened. So, I do not really look forward to his answer being one based on that kind of ability.

I would ask him, however: When the application from CNR for a 10 per cent increase in freight rates is considered by the CTC, will the government also consider making some representations to the CTC which will, if any such increase is granted, offset its adverse effect upon the ports of the east coast of Canada, such as Halifax and Saint John?

Senator Olson: I will also take that question as notice. I am sure my honourable friend is aware of the situation where the members of the CTC hear these applications and make their own decisions based on the facts presented to them.

Senator Smith: I understand that, but what I am asking is, if the CTC grants such an increase, will the government consider taking some measures which will help to ameliorate the effect of that increase upon the ports of eastern Canada, such as Saint John and Halifax, because it will have an adverse effect on the use by European countries—and perhaps countries farther afield than Europe—of those ports, because they balance the cost of going farther with a ship to land the freight at some other place, such as New York, against the cost of paying the extra freight from the eastern ports of Canada to the central markets of the continent?

Senator Olson: Yes, I heard that question and I am sure my honourable friend recognized the hypothetical nature of his question.

Senator Smith: It won't be hypothetical when it comes home to roost on the people who are going to lose their jobs in Halifax and Saint John.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

CABINET DOCUMENT—REDEPLOYMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES—FUNDING OF DREE PROGRAMS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development and arises out of a document I received which purports to be a memorandum to cabinet sponsored by the Honourable "A. J." Olson, Minister of State for Economic Development, entitled—

An Hon. Senator: Not another leak!

Senator Murray:—"Priorities for Federal Government Economic Development Policies and Expenditures to the mid-1980's"—a document which I am sure will provide material for many Question Periods to come.

I want to focus for the moment on the minister's call to his colleagues to take action now, and I quote:

—to redeploy Canada's human resources from areas or industries with low rates of productivity or returns into resource or resource-based and high-productivity and high-technology industries or areas,—

A reading of that paragraph and of many other paragraphs in the document leads me to conclude that the government is returning to the old Walter Gordon philosophy of writing off geographic areas of the country where productivity may be low, or where there is slow economic growth, and denuding those areas of their population and moving them elsewhere. Therefore, I ask the minister what programs he has in mind to achieve this objective, as he puts it, or redeploying Canada's human resources.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the problem with that question is that the source, as claimed by Senator Murray, is a document that he knows very well he is not supposed to have. Somebody has stolen it, or leaked it, or whatever they do and—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is it true or not?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Who did it?

Senator Olson: I certainly am not going to give any credibility to that source of information by even answering "yes," "no," "maybe" or "indifferent," unless and until he can demonstrate to me quotations from documents that he has in his possession legally.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): They slipped it under the door, did they?

[Senator Smith.]

Senator Murray: It is not my problem if the minister's ship is leaky, and it is not my problem if the minister is unable to control his own cabinet documents. The fact of the matter is that this document is now a public document. It is being circulated publicly, and I have received a copy. I suggest to the minister that he has a great deal of explaining to do to the Canadian people and to Parliament now that this document with some of these obnoxious recommendations has been made public.

Senator Perrault: Watergate!

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Where did you get it?

Senator Murray: It appears to me, from a quick reading of the document—and, as I say, there will be the opportunity, for many Question Periods to come, to examine the minister on these recommended policies—that DREE, as we have known it in the past, and certainly as the provinces have known it, is to become a dead duck.

Senator Olson: That is not what it says.

Senator Murray: Well, I am glad that the minister acknowledges the existence of the document. I thank the minister for that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I thought you were not going to make any comment.

Senator Murray: I quote this paragraph about DREE from the document:

The proposals to largely replace the GDA mechanism which has been the main instrument of DREE over the past seven years by unilateral delivery—

And I emphasize the word "unilateral".

—with involvement of local representatives amounts to a fundamental shift in approach. It leads to a strengthening of the links between national and regional economic development strategies. It involves an enhanced direct federal role in economic development at the sub-provincial level. These changes appear to respond to the evolving nature of the regional development problem. The same applies to the drastic reduction in funding of infrastructure which also makes possible a reduction in federal-provincial programming and accords with policy priorities in this regard. However, the extent of withdrawal from federal-provincial programming raises questions as to the cost of duplication of delivery mechanisms, the risk of lack of co-ordination of federal and provincial efforts, the reduction in expenditure leverage, the successes and problems to be expected from people programming,— —and implications on federal-provincial relations.

Whatever that is.

The minister talks about a substantial decline in support for infrastructure programs—

Senator Perrault: Oh, for heaven's sake!

Senator Murray: —and says also:

Joint federal-provincial programming is to play a lesser role.

I want to know from the minister whether, in fact, these proposals from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, to which he refers in the present and future tense, are now the policy of the government, because, as it happens, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has under advisement the whole area of regional policy and is getting ready to present a report in this place one of these days.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator asked if it is a fact. The only fact that we have in front of us is that the honourable senator is in possession of a stolen document.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: That is the fact, and it does not matter whether it was recently stolen, or when; it is still hot.

Senator Perrault: It's hot goods!

Senator Olson: The second fact that is in front of us, I think, is a clear demonstration of what happens with the so-called freedom of information. He does not say whether or not cabinet approved this document; all he says is that he is in possession of a stolen document that bears my name as its sponsor. These are interdepartmental or intra-cabinet communications, and he is putting it out here now as if it had been approved by the government.

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator Flynn: No! No!

Senator Olson: I could find some pretty good descriptions for that kind of activity.

Senator Perrault: A receiver of stolen property.

Senator Olson: If Senator Murray thinks he is going to read it chapter and verse, I think senators really have to consider very seriously, when a senator or any member—I know what the rules are in the other place: if you are going to read documents you had better be prepared to table them. Therefore, if you are going to start to read these things and you are going to be prepared to table them, then I think you take on the responsibility for having obtained them illegally. I am sure my honourable friends opposite are not going to take on that responsibility.

Senator Asselin: What rule is that? Cite the rule.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, however long he reads out of a stolen, alleged cabinet document, I am not going to give it the credibility of answering in any tense—either past, present or future—that there is any authenticity to that document at all.

Senator Flynn: You have already confirmed the authenticity ten times.

Senator Murray: I am neither impressed nor insulted by the minister's indignation, but I must say—

Senator Perrault: Give us the name and we will put it on the record.

● (1530)

Senator Steuart: Tory research!

Senator Perrault: Turn over all of your tapes as well.

Senator Murray: It was precisely to give the minister the opportunity of saying how this document fared when it got to the cabinet table that I raised it today in Question Period. It was precisely to give the minister the opportunity to say whether it does represent now the policy of the government.

Senator Olson: The answer is very simple. It is that when we are ready to make an announcement, we will make it in the usual course.

Senator Murray: My question was asked precisely to give the minister the opportunity of stating whether this is government policy and how the document fared when it got to cabinet. If he wishes to say that these matters are still in the discussion stage, that they are still under consideration, we will understand that.

Honourable senators, my final question concerns DREE, because I believe it is susceptible to a pretty clear answer, if the minister is willing to give it. I quote from the document:

Additionally DREE is proposing funding some programming from the Western Development Fund and the Energy Envelope and other funding sources. These are proposals for major water and soil projects in the west and selected energy projects in the Atlantic region.

I asked a question last night, as a matter of fact, about the Western Development Fund. I wonder whether the minister can identify further the projects that DREE now proposes to fund by raiding the Western Development Fund.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to the comments I made a few minutes ago. I will not give any credibility to stolen documents.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: But you did. It's too late to say that.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

PROPOSED MULTILATERAL TRADE TALKS—INCLUSION OF CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Balfour on October 15 concerning proposed United States trade talks with other major industrial countries and the possibility of Canada's participation.

The Government of Canada made representations to the Government of the United States expressing an interest in participating in the U.S. proposed multilateral trade talks. I am informed that the meetings originally scheduled did not take place. We expect, however, that if the meetings proceed, the Government of Canada will be involved.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised by Senator Charbonneau on October 27 concerning the possibility of government assistance to Chrysler to resume production in its Windsor engine plant.

Of course, we would like to see the resumption of production in the engine plant at Windsor. However, I must inform honourable senators that I do not believe that a formal proposal requesting funds for financial assistance has been presented to the federal government.

The government has set in place a number of programs which are available to companies wishing to establish in Windsor. Specific details of these programs can be obtained from my colleagues the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

TRANSPORT

WESTERN CANADA—REDUCTION OF RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Charbonneau on October 20 concerning the CTC recommendation to keep rail lines alive.

The CTC did indeed recommend to keep the rail lines alive. However, the CTC, being a regulatory body, is independent of the government and independent of the government's responsibility for fiscal management.

The government therefore had to assume that responsibility and decided there had to be some limit on subsidizing rail lines. It was therefore decided to eliminate the lines with no potential, such as, for example, those running next to highways.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE STUDY OF VIA RAIL—APPEARANCE OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 3 Senator Riley asked a question concerning the appearance of the Minister of Transport before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Honourable senators, I have contacted the office of the Minister of Transport and have discussed this matter with him. We have learned that his office has been in touch with the clerk of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. I understand that the minister is willing to appear before the committee and will be in touch shortly to arrange a mutually agreeable date.

[Senator Olson.]

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

NATIVE LAND CLAIMS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CABINET DISCUSSION PAPER

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question asked by Senator Bielish on October 29 relating to a document which she termed a cabinet discussion paper and which, she maintained, had been mentioned in a newspaper that she named. I take it that the honourable senator did not have such a document in her hand.

I have to report that the government has not released any documents in the form of discussion papers on the subject of the settlement of native land claims. The government is continuing the preparation of its analysis and study of the question of native claims, including land claims, and when it is possible for the government to make a comprehensive policy statement a document will be released.

INDIAN ACT—DISCRIMINATORY PROVISIONS

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): On October 29 Senator Bielish asked, with respect to discriminatory provisions contained in the Indian Act, whether the government would proceed with a simple amendment to deal with the matter of discrimination against Indian women, or whether such an amendment would be part of a larger package.

I wish to report that the government will deal with that question of discrimination as a separate issue, but no legislation will be proceeded with until the current constitutional talks have been concluded.

The honourable senator asked a further question concerning compensation for persons, particularly female persons, with respect to loss of Indian status as a result of marriage to non-status Indians.

The government is not giving consideration to providing financial compensation to such individuals. Their status, if lost, was lost as a result of a valid act of Parliament, and there is no legal or precedential practice to provide a claim for compensation.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

DELAY IN COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION—IMPACT ON NATIVE PEOPLES

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, on October 29 Senator Lucier asked, with respect to the Norman Wells pipeline, whether there was a program of assistance to native peoples with respect to the development of an oil pipeline from Norman Wells.

I would advise honourable senators that when the project was approved, the government identified, as an expenditure item, a sum of approximately $21 million to be spent at the beginning of this year and over the next four years to enhance northern benefits and to provide for the mitigation of adverse social and environmental consequences with respect to the building of that pipeline.

Proposals for spending are now before Treasury Board, and it is hoped that specific expenditures will be approved and that work will be underway early in 1982.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CHANGES IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Cottreau, Stollery, Leblanc and Anderson be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Adams, Davey, Lucier and McElman on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

MINISTERIAL ANNOUNCEMENT RE RIDLEY ISLAND
PUBLIC ACCESS COAL TERMINAL FACILITY

OTTAWA, October 30, 1981—Senator H. A. (Bud) Olson, Minister of State for Economic Development, Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin, Senator Ray Perrault and Senator Jack Austin, B.C. representatives in the Federal Cabinet, reaffirmed today that the federal government will fulfil its commitment to build a public access coal terminal facility on Ridley Island.

The Ministers expressed regret that Teck Corporation, Quintette Coal Limited and a Consortium comprised of Federal Commerce and Navigation Ltd., Gulf Resources Inc., Esso Resources Canada Ltd. and Manalta Coal Ltd. have been unable to reach agreement on financial arrangements for operation of the coal terminal.

"We made a firm commitment last February to have the coal port constructed and ready to receive the first shipments of coal from the two coal producers' mines, scheduled to arrive at the port in the Fall of 1983," the Ministers said. "Failure of the coal companies and the Consortium to reach agreement in time for the federal government to meet its commitment for the port's construction threatened to jeopardize this major economic development opportunity for British Columbians and all Canadians. It was imperative that the federal government step in and take direct action to ensure that all of its commitments associated with the development of the North East B.C. coal block are honoured and, in particular, to ensure that port construction proceeds on a critically tight schedule to meet the coal companies' shipping requirements" the Ministers added.

Over the past weeks, the Ministers and officials of the National Harbours Board have made every effort to bring interested parties together to facilitate an agreement so that port construction can proceed on schedule. Lengthy discussions were held with all interested parties to determine the best possible arrangement to ensure that fundamental objectives of the federal government were met for the port's development and operation. These objectives, which the federal government has consistently adhered to throughout the negotiations are to ensure that:

- all shippers, present as well as future coal shippers in B.C. and other parts of western Canada, have fair and equitable access to the port;
- all shippers be provided fair and equitable rates for shipping coal through the port;
- the port operates on a developmental basis until April 1989 and thereafter on a commercial basis; and that —while ensuring commercial port operation, the best possible rate post April 1989 be available to all coal shippers.

The Ministers announced that after careful exploration of various alternatives, the National Harbours Board will enter into an agreement with Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited for the design, construction and operation of a coal terminal facility on Ridley Island. The NHB and Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited will jointly undertake to form a corporation. The NHB will assume a 90 per cent equity position in the corporation and Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited will assume the remaining 10 per cent equity position.

The federal government will initially guarantee loans from financial institutions for 80 per cent of the financial requirements of the corporation with the remaining 20 per cent to be equally shared by the NHB and Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited. The NHB share will be approximately $23 million. It is expected that the loan guarantee arrangement will be interim and replaced by throughput contracts for coal.

"We are confident that through this arrangement fair and equitable access and fair and equitable rates to all shippers will be achieved. In addition the interim federal loan guarantee will assure timely construction of the port and provide the best possible rate for all coal shippers. The new corporation will pass on the benefits to be derived from the Government guarantee and a lower return on equity participation in the form of lower throughput rates to all coal shippers after 1989", the Ministers said.

Ministers outlined additional specific commitments of the federal government regarding development and operation of the port as follows:

1. A guarantee by the federal government of an indexed throughput charge to a maximum of $3.00 ($ 1980) per tonne until April 1, 1989 for coal at Ridley Island.
2. The index on the throughput rate to be 80 % of the Consumer Price Index commencing from May 1, 1980 to April 1, 1989.
3. Assistance, through the National Harbours Board, for off-site services related to both the grain and coal terminals at Ridley Island.
4. Canada—British Columbia subsidiary agreement for the access road to Ridley Island on a 50:50 shared cost basis at an estimated federal share of $4 million.

5. Commencing on April 1, 1989, the new corporation will be expected to operate the coal terminal facility in a commercial manner.
6. As an additional developmental measure, no interest will be charged, until 1989, for funds advanced to the National Harbours Board for the development of the Ridley Island site.

The National Harbours Board is on schedule for meeting its commitments for site preparation. The Ministers announced that, on the basis of a Treasury Board decision of August 1981, a $550,000 project management contract has been awarded to CBA Engineering of Vancouver. A further contract for site clearing will be awarded within the next few weeks. By mid December the National Harbours Board will call tenders for a site grading contract which is expected to be in excess of $25 million.

The Ministers emphasized that the federal government is providing significant developmental assistance for the terminal and substantial capital investment. They said that the government would continue to honour its commitments relating to other aspects of the North East B.C. Coal project.

CN intends to spend approximately $175 million on line improvements and approximately $100 million on equipment purchases related to the development by the middle of this decade.

All of CN's investments are to be recovered through the commercial freight rate it has quoted to the coal companies.

The federal government has also undertaken to exercise all of its responsibilities relative to the protection of the environment and has established a consultative process with the native people of the area.

Details of the NHB/Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited joint undertaking are attached.

DETAILS OF THE BUSINESS JOINT UNDERTAKING BETWEEN THE NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD AND FEDERAL COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION LTD.

1. A Joint Undertaking will be formed between the National Harbours Board and Federal Commerce and Navigation Ltd. (FEDCOM), a Canadian Company.
2. The capital structure of the new Corporation will be composed of 80 per cent debt and 20 per cent equity. The NHB will assume a 90 per cent equity position in the corporation and Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited will assume the remaining 10 per cent equity position.
3. The Corporation is committed to build the coal terminal at Ridley Island and the completion date is scheduled to match the date at which the coal becomes available.
4. Loans for 80 per cent of the financial requirements will be obtained from Canadian financial institutions, and will be guaranteed by the Federal Government. The remaining 20 per cent will be equally shared by the NHB and Federal Commerce and Navigation Limited. The guarantee will be interim and replaced by throughput contracts for coal.
5. The new corporation will pass on the benefits to be derived from the Government guarantee and a lower return on equity participation in the form of lower throughput charges to the coal shippers after 1989.
6. Upon the commencement of operations the new corporation is committed to meet interest payments on the capital loan from operating cash flows, while principal payments will begin only when any short term debt has been eliminated.
7. Once the terminal is completed and a mutually agreed throughput has been obtained, any subsequent operating cash deficiencies will be borrowed and guaranteed 10 per cent by FEDCOM and 90 per cent by the Federal Government. This borrowing would be considered as short term debt, and the repayment of the long-term debt and interest associated with the capital cost of construction will be subordinated to the repayment of the short-term debt.
8. The terminal will be operated as a neutral public facility with fair and equal access for all coal shippers on a first-come, first-served basis.
9. Fair and equitable rates will be charged to all coal shippers. Provision will be made to expand the coal terminal's capacity as warranted by demand.
10. Federal Commerce and Navigation Company Ltd. will manage the operation of the coal terminal under contract with the new Corporation.

THE CONSTITUTION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to explain the delay in having the bell rung.

I am sure that all members of the Senate are aware that ten of the eleven governments have reached agreement on the question of the Constitution. In substance, they have reached agreement on the three basic areas of concern, namely: patriation, an amending formula, and a Charter of Rights. These ten governments have all agreed to patriation, an amending formula and a Charter of Rights. I do not propose to go into any further detail because I am sure the Leader of the Government in the Senate will give an explanation when he arrives from the Conference Centre, as will the Prime Minister in the other place.

I merely wished to explain the reason for the late ringing of the bell. This agreement, described by the Prime Minister as both encouraging and opportune, is indeed of great historic importance. I am sure that we shall have an explanation, and an opportunity to study its details very soon.

Therefore, I suggest that we proceed with our Order Paper, awaiting any statements that our cabinet colleagues may wish to make, or we can await the arrival of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is anybody ready to speak on this question? My suggestion is that if the Leader of the Government is going to be with us later on, ready to make a precise statement on this matter, we should delay any comment—or even questions, for that matter—until then, because otherwise we may only create confusion.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that was my intention exactly, but I did feel that I should at least give the cabinet colleagues of the Leader of the Government in the Senate an opportunity to speak, if they wish. If they do not, then we can leave the question of any further comment until the arrival of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, if I may, I should like to say that my friends opposite will realize that the conference only ended at 2.15 p.m. What we do have at present is a statement of what nine provinces have signed and have agreed to, which is the basis of the agreement. I was handed a copy of this as I entered the chamber. The problem with reading it is that it assumes a very high level of knowledge of the whole background of this process. For instance, it refers to such things as the April Accord, and a whole lot of other things. Therefore, I do not believe it would be possible to prepare a detailed, comprehensive report on what has happened without being thoroughly familiar with all the background. It could hardly be expected that anyone here is, in fact, in that position. Nevertheless, the possibility exists that later today the Leader of the Government in the Senate will make a statement that is reasonably comprehensive. It would be fleshed out from there, of course.

Senator Flynn: Would you suggest that we wait for Senator Perrault to join us? If he does, and if he is ready at that time to make a full statement, we can then discuss the matter—of course, with the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators, that is what I am suggesting. It is right in line with what the deputy leader has stated. In fairness to the honourable gentlemen opposite, let me say that the basis for the accord that was reached was known a little earlier. That is the communication that was sent from the nine provinces, and that is written in language that is not comprehensible to anyone who has not followed the proceedings up to this hour.

● (1440)

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator, however, should realize that if nine out of ten premiers agreed on something, the problem is not with what they agreed upon but, rather, with what the tenth premier—namely, the Premier of Quebec—objected to. I would not want to comment on that before we know exactly what the position is. If there were ten premiers agreeing with Mr. Trudeau, there would be no problem in discussing this or in saying “Hallelujah!” right away, but I think it would be a little premature to do that at this point.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I suggest that we take the advice of the deputy leader and see whether we can have that information before the end of this sitting.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask the minister whether my information is correct that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister intends to make a statement in the other place at 3 o'clock this afternoon? If so, would it not be possible for the Leader of the Government, or one of the ministers, to obtain a copy of his statement and read it into the record here at the same time, there being no lack, as the minister is aware, of copying machines in the government?

Senator Olson: The minister is aware of all of that, but there is one assumption made by the honourable senator regarding which I do not know that we can give a commitment. That assumption is that the Prime Minister will read from a prepared statement in making his report to the other place. Taking into consideration the time factor, it is highly likely that there will be no manuscript. If that is the case, honourable senators can see the impossibility of acceding to that request.

Senator Flynn: That is quite obvious.

Senator Frith: Senator Murray may wish to enlist the help of his colleagues who stole the other document, to see if he can get hold of this one the same way.

Senator Flynn: I hope it will not be from the same source.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with a change in the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

(Fort text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator McElman be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Anderson on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I propose to move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned to Monday next, November 9, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I say "I propose to move" in the expectation that nothing that the Leader of the Government has to say will change that arrangement. Honourable senators will remember that next week is a split week because Wednesday is Remembrance Day and we will not sit then. After discussions with the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, we felt it best to sit on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon of next week, and then not return for Thursday and Friday. At the time we discussed this, we did not know the outcome of the constitutional conference. I do not think that anything we know up to now should change that, but I shall withhold making that motion until we hear what honourable senators wish.

Perhaps it would be appropriate now to have the Leader of the Government in the Senate—who has just come from the Conference Centre—make a statement or tell us what he thinks we should know about the deliberations there.

THE CONSTITUTION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND GOVERNMENTS OF ONTARIO, NOVA SCOTIA, NEW BRUNSWICK, MANITOBA, BRITISH COLUMBIA, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND, SASKATCHEWAN, ALBERTA AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have just come from the Conference Centre. As I think all honourable senators are now aware, an agreement has indeed been achieved involving the first ministers of Canada, nine of the ten provinces and the federal government, on matters relating to the Constitution, the amending formula and patriation.

The basic statement which has just been issued is brief, and I will take this opportunity to read it to honourable senators. Then I will table all of the material that has been made available to me. I should like to give a copy of the statement to the Leader of the Opposition at this time. The statement reads:

November 5, 1981

In an effort to reach an acceptable consensus on the constitutional issue which meets the concerns of the federal government and a substantial number of provincial governments, the undersigned governments have agreed to the following:

(1) Patriation

(2) Amending Formula:

—Acceptance of the April Accord Amending Formula with the deletion of Section 3 which provides for fiscal compensation to a province which opts out of a constitutional amendment.

—The Delegation of Legislative Authority from the April Accord is deleted.

(3) Charter of Rights and Freedoms:

—The entrenchment of the full Charter of Rights and Freedoms now before Parliament with the following changes:

(a) With respect to Mobility Rights the inclusion of the right of a province to undertake affirmative action programs for socially and economically disadvantaged individuals as long as a province's employment rate was below the National average.

(b) A "notwithstanding" clause covering sections dealing with Fundamental Freedoms, Legal Rights and Equality Rights. Each "notwithstanding" provision would require reenactment not less frequently than once every five years.

(c) We have agreed that the provisions of Section 23 in respect of Minority Language Education Rights will apply to our provinces.

(4) The provisions of the Act now before Parliament relating to Equalization and Regional Disparities, and Non-Renewable Natural Resources, Forestry Resources and Electrical Energy would be included.

(5) A constitutional conference as provided for in clause 36 of the Resolution, including in its agenda an item respecting constitutional matters that directly affect the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, including the identification and definition of the rights of those peoples to be included in the Constitution of Canada, shall be provided for in the Resolution. The Prime Minister of Canada shall invite representatives of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada to participate in the discussion of that item.

Honourable senators, the document is signed as follows: for Canada, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau; for Ontario, Premier William G. Davis; for Nova Scotia, Premier John M. Buchanan; for New Brunswick, Premier Richard B. Hatfield; for Manitoba, in the absence of and for Premier Sterling R. Lyon, by the Attorney General of Manitoba; for British Columbia, Premier William R. Bennett; for Prince Edward Island, Premier J. Angus MacLean; for Saskatchewan, Premier Allan E. Blakeney; for Alberta, Premier Peter Lougheed; and for Newfoundland, Premier A. Brian Peckford.

Honourable senators, this is a significant and, indeed, historic occasion in the evolution of our nation. I know that, in the days and weeks to come, honourable senators will wish to discuss and debate various aspects of the agreement which has been achieved, and I know that this document will give rise to numerous questions to which I will not be able to provide full answers, since the negotiations concluded only this morning. The explanatory information, which will help in answering the detailed and technical questions arising from this agreement, has not been made available as yet, but there will be a full opportunity in the very near future for those questions to be dealt with and, of course, for other statements to be made.

It is not without significance, honourable senators, that the Premier of Quebec has not signed this agreement, but the Right Honourable the Prime Minister stated in the open session—which, I believe, was seen by a number of honourable senators—that there is at least the hope that some modifications and accommodations can be made later which will encourage the Premier of Quebec to affix his signature to this historic document.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, would what the Leader of the Government has just described occur before the passing of the resolution in both houses?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the implication of the question just asked is: Will the present arrangement necessitate a modification in the resolution before us, and will it require the assent of the Senate? Honourable senators, I can say: Yes, that is the case.

Before tabling this document, it may be of interest to honourable senators to have a copy of it, including the premier's signatures. If so, I shall have it photocopied. I believe it is a rather important document which honourable senators will cherish.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this agreement is cause for rejoicing.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Of course, we hope that eventually agreement from the Province of Quebec will be added to that of the other nine provinces. What I would like to highlight at this time is the complete change of attitude of the Prime Minister, which is a great consolation to many of us and, as I have said, it should be followed by efforts to make it possible for the Government of Quebec to add its signature to the agreement.

I would like the Leader of the Government to confirm a few points, either now or later. As I understand it, the referendum clause in the amending formula has been deleted.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Hurrah!

Senator Flynn: From the viewpoint of the dissenting provinces and the viewpoints expressed by some of us here and in the other place, that is very important.

My second question will perhaps depend on the reaction of Senator Steuart, but do I understand that the veto of the Senate becomes merely a suspensive veto in the case of amendments to the Constitution? Does the leader say, "Yes"?

Senator Perrault: I am noting carefully all of the questions.

Senator Flynn: This is of interest, not because I object but because, with an amending formula, I do not see how the Senate could resist the will of the provinces as provided for in that amending formula, even if it were for the abolition of the Senate and the forced retirement of Senator Steuart, for instance.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: You worry about yourself.

Senator Flynn: I don't worry about myself. The difference between you and me is that absolutely nobody worries about me.

It is my understanding that there was agreement from Premier Lévesque with respect to mobility rights. However, one of the most important points is the reason the Premier of Quebec said, "No". It is my understanding that his negative response concerns minority language rights in terms of education and the compensation for governments opting out. Are those the only two points which prevented Premier Lévesque from signing the accord? I believe the Leader of the Government mentioned that the Prime Minister had indicated his willingness to find a solution to those two points.

On the question of compensation, of course, if a province opting out cannot prove that the opting out means a reduction of revenues, I think it is logical that no compensation should be provided. Perhaps we should stipulate that compensation should be paid only if the opting out implies a reduction of revenues. It seems to me that this would be an easy concession to make, and I would hope that the federal government would be prepared to do so.

Education is a rather more technical matter, but it seems to me that in this respect there is also the possibility of a solution.

I should like the Leader of the Government to tell me if those are the only two points which have justified or explained the refusal of Premier Lévesque to give his agreement.

Senator Perrault: I appreciate the comments and inquiries made by the Leader of the Opposition. First, as to the matter of the referendum, it is my understanding that the referendum device or alternative is not contained in the agreement.

Secondly, some form of suspensive veto for the Senate has been put forward.

Senator Roblin: On Constitution matters.

Senator Asselin: That also applies to Senator Steuart.

Senator Perrault: I do not have all of the final details on any of these points. The Province of Quebec, indeed, registered certain objections, primarily in those two areas mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition—financial compensation to provinces should they opt out of certain sections, and educational minority language rights. Other matters on which I have not received full briefing, as yet, were discussed during the final hours of the meetings.

Honourable senators, I have taken note of the questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition, and perhaps at the next sitting of the Senate statements can be provided on these and other points raised by honourable senators.

Senator Asselin: If the document were before the Senate, we would have a better basis for discussion. I am restricted in the questions I can ask today because we do not have the document before us. It is my understanding that the resolution document will be placed before both houses, and it is my feeling that we should wait until the document is before us before we have any further discussion.

Senator Perrault: Senator Asselin makes an excellent point. I was about to say that literally at this moment some of the documents are in the process of being printed. I think we should provide honourable senators with as much documentation as possible, so that they may understand the implications of this agreement and its details. After that, it would certainly be worthwhile having a debate take place in the Senate on this agreement and all its implications.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I appreciate that at this time it is not reasonable to expect the Leader of the Government to be able to give us detailed information, either on the agreement that has been reached or on the procedure to be adopted. I wonder if he is in a position to comment briefly on the latter. Would we be correct in assuming from what has transpired that this will now necessitate redrafting the entire package that was before the two houses of Parliament? In other words, I assume that the changes are too comprehensive to be treated merely as amendments to that package, and that it would be a matter of starting again with an entirely new package.

If that is to be the procedure to be followed, or if there is some other procedure intended, could the Leader of the Government give us any indication at this time as to when this matter might come before the two houses of Parliament for debate? I ask because some of us have problems arranging transportation and would wish to be here for these debates.

I presume it would be unreasonable to expect that this would be ready for next week, because of the tremendous amount of work that will have to be done in redrafting the whole package. Could the leader give us any further information along those lines?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have made preliminary inquiries on this matter, and it is my understanding that the package will have to be redrafted—in fact, we will be dealing with a substantially altered motion and perhaps an entirely new motion.

In view of the importance of this debate, I am sure that the whips will keep all honourable senators fully informed as to when it will take place and as to the proposed parliamentary schedule for the motion.

Certainly, all government supporters will be kept fully informed as to the schedule, and that information will be provided in as complete a form as possible to all honourable senators, but it will necessitate a new motion or a substantially modified one.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, this question may also be difficult to answer, but it is on a matter which will concern us all. Will the news that we have received today affect the order of each house limiting the debate to two days?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the order of each of the two houses limiting the debate to two days refers specifically to the package now before Parliament. Therefore, if we are going to deal with a new package, there is no question but that both orders will be affected as deeply as anything could be affected; that is to say, they will not be operative.

Senator Flynn: I guess you could always introduce a new motion.

Senator Frith: We could always introduce a new motion, if necessary, and a new order in similar terms, but that was not the question. The question was whether the present orders are affected, and I think they are.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, I wish to pursue a little further the one point I raised earlier. I appreciate what the leader has said, that we will be kept advised as to the timetable, but, in view of what was said earlier by the deputy leader, that we will probably sit only on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon of next week, would I be correct in assuming that this matter will not be before the house next week? Is that a reasonable assumption?

Senator Perrault: That is the present indication. I shall be in contact with the office of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister later today to discuss the parliamentary plans for this very important motion. Should there be any change, that information will be communicated immediately to you.

Senator Flynn: I suggest that the urgency has disappeared.

Senator Roblin: Could the honourable leader confirm my understanding of the meaning of section (3)(b) of the agreement, which deals with the "notwithstanding" clause? As I interpret this, we find that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is entrenched in one sense, and yet the "notwithstanding" clause empowers any legislature—this one or that of any one of the provinces—to pass a law dealing with fundamental freedoms, legal rights and equality rights that contradicts or abridges the charter in some way or another by specifying that, notwithstanding the Charter of Rights, they pass this law; and that, furthermore, they are obliged to re-enact that provision every five years if it is to remain valid. This seems to me to be a most significant departure from the previous policy of an entrenchment that indeed was entrenched.

Am I correct in thinking that this "notwithstanding" provision makes it possible for any legislature to alter the Bill of Rights in respect of fundamental freedoms, legal rights and equality rights by simply providing for that in the terms of the legislation?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in anticipating that questions might be raised in both chambers on this point, I do have some explanatory material regarding the question posed by Senator Roblin. I should make it clear that the provinces were very supportive of this particular change.

Senator Roblin: I should think so.

Senator Perrault: A "notwithstanding" clause is one which enables a legislative body, federal or provincial, to enact expressly that a particular provision of an act will be valid notwithstanding the fact that it is in conflict with a specific provision of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The "notwithstanding" principle has been recognized and is contained in a number of bills of rights, including the Canadian Bill of Rights, which, of course, was sponsored by the late John Diefenbaker; the Alberta Bill of Rights, 1972; the Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 1975; the Saskatchewan Human Rights Code, 1979; and Ontario's Bill 7 to amend its Human Rights Code, 1981.

Honourable senators, it would be applied in this fashion: Any enactment overriding any specific provisions of the charter would contain a clause expressly declaring that a specific provision of the proposed enactment shall operate notwithstanding a specific provision of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Any "notwithstanding" enactment would have to be reviewed and renewed every five years by the enacting legislature if it is to remain in force.

Senator Roblin: Then I take it from that explanation that this constitutional document explicitly recognizes the primacy of the legislature over the Bill of Rights in connection with these particulars. That seems to be a very significant change from what was proposed before. Now the document provides that Parliament or the legislatures will indeed have the last word with respect to rights in these particular fields.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not want to comment beyond the information I have just provided. I will be pleased to provide further information on behalf of the government on this point. At the same time, I appreciate Senator Roblin's views on the matter.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on this very point. Would this "notwithstanding" clause apply to all the areas of the charter? For instance, if it did apply to language rights, it seems to me that the reservations or objections of Premier Lévesque on language rights would be solved by the application of this "notwithstanding" clause. He could maintain, for instance, all the provisions of Bill 101 which could be—and I do not say that they would be—which could be affected by the Charter of Rights, and a subsequent government could, of course, just abolish that. I would like the leader to try to get that specific information regarding language rights.

• (1510)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that there is no opting out provision for language rights.

Senator Flynn: There is no "notwithstanding" clause either?

Senator Perrault: That is my understanding. However, I will be pleased to bring a further statement to the Senate.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, may I revert to the point alluded to by Senator Manning a few moments ago. I do not wish to belabour the point, but some of us have to make arrangements for travelling and it is becoming increasingly difficult to do that. In view of the information that has come to us since Senator Frith intimated that he would be introducing a motion that the Senate adjourn until Monday evening, is it still the deputy leader's intention to introduce that motion?

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government?

After the conference, when he spoke to the premiers and the people of Canada, the Prime Minister intimated that he hoped an agreement could be reached with Quebec, especially on the conflicting issues. Could the Leader of the Government enquire as to whether arrangements have been made to hold meetings, at the ministerial level, in order to try and find a solution which Quebec might agree with?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice. Certainly the Right Honourable the Prime Minister demonstrated a most forthcoming and conciliatory attitude at that meeting, as honourable senators are aware.

Senator Flynn: Very new.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, may I seek from the Leader of the Government clarification of a reservation in the form of a marginal note signed by the representative of the Manitoba Premier. It says:

Subject to the approval of section 3(c) by the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba.

Not being close to the actual resolution, and not being aware of what the "3(c)" means, can that marginal note be explained?

An Hon. Senator: The explanation is there.

Senator Buckwold: I am sorry; I had not noticed it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have nothing to add—at least not at this time—with regard to that point. The question will be taken as notice. The Premier of Manitoba was not present for the final signing session, as honourable senators can see. I do not know the full implications of that marginal notation.

Senator Roblin: It may have something to do with the Manitoba Act, which contains language provisions that were recently adjudicated. I suspect that might be the reason.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I now table:

Agreement between the federal government and provincial governments, dated November 5, 1981, with respect to a consensus on the constitutional issue.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Further to what I already said regarding next week, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it remain adjourned until 8 p.m. next Monday, November 9, 1981.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is permission granted?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, do you wish to carry this motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Yes, of course, honourable senators, but first, for the record, I would like to point out that the plan put forward by the Deputy Leader of the Government was that we would sit Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, and that the Senate would subsequently adjourn until the following week. Wednesday being Armistice Day, the Senate will not sit, nor will the House of Commons, and we shall not come back Thursday or Friday. We shall not sit until the following week, that is understood.

Second, do I understand that there may be legislation before the Senate on Monday or Tuesday, when we might be examining today's agreements?

Finally, I have another question of interest to honourable senators, and perhaps it should be answered by the Leader of the Government: Will the budget be brought down on Thursday, the 12th, as planned?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, regarding the first comment made by the Leader of the Opposition, that is correct, with one reservation which is, I imagine, sufficiently clear, that if anything happens requiring our presence here on Thursday or Friday of next week, honourable senators will be advised Monday or Tuesday, or later, depending on the circumstances. However, we intend, as the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate has just said, to sit Monday evening at 8 o'clock and Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, but not Tuesday evening.

Senator Flynn: Not Thursday or Friday?

Senator Frith: Exactly, not Thursday or Friday. What was the second question?

Senator Flynn: The other question was about what we had on the agenda.

Senator Frith: This week, I think the house is supposed to continue consideration of Bill C-48, with the intention or should I say the ambitious desire to deal with non-controversial bills Friday afternoon. So it is quite possible that next week we may have one or two or three bills if they are passed tomorrow in the House.

As for the third question, I believe the Minister of Finance intends to bring down the budget on Thursday, and if there are any corrections to be made here, perhaps my colleagues or Senator Perrault could tell us whether there has been a change of plan here as well, but I believe that Thursday is still the day or the evening designated for the budget speech.

Senator Flynn: Thank you.

[English]

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I seek clarification on another point from either the Leader of the Government or the deputy leader. Did I understand the Leader of the Government to say that because of the documentation problem there would be no possibility of a debate on today's developments on either Monday or Tuesday? Did I hear him correctly, that the documentation would not be available in time for a debate on Monday or Tuesday?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the Leader of the Government will reply.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I recall, in response to a question asked by Senator Asselin, I agreed that it would not be possible to have a full debate immediately on the subject of the constitutional agreement; that a discussion should not be held until honourable senators had at least some basic information with respect to the federal-provincial agreement. I cannot recall stating that I felt it would mean that nothing could be said on the subject on Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Senator Grosart: I raise the question because, in view of the information that we are not expected to sit on Wednesday, Thursday or Friday, it would be unwise, perhaps, for the Senate to be put in a position where this most important matter would not be formally discussed in the Senate for a whole week, particularly if arrangements are being made for a full scale debate in the other place.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am sorry that my attention was otherwise engaged when the question was asked, and I apologize to Senator Grosart. Was he asking when we could anticipate a full scale debate?

Senator Grosart: My question was, or should have been: Would it be in the best interests of the Senate if there were no arrangement for a formal debate on this most important development for the whole of next week?

● (1520)

Senator Frith: I think that would depend, as the Leader of the Government has said, and as Senator Asselin has suggested, on whether we can have the necessary material in advance for a full scale debate. If I understand the pith and substance of what Senator Grosart has been saying, it certainly would not be wise to have a debate until we had time to make sure we were well informed.

Honourable senators, I want to say that Senator Lafond, who is the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on National Defence, has asked that the committee have permission to meet on Monday night at 9 o'clock, even though the Senate might then be sitting. I certainly regret choosing my good friend Senator Lafond as a reason for expressing my view that it should be the exception for a committee to meet while the Senate is sitting.

I find—and I say this with every respect—that the moment I suggest a date for a sitting of the Senate I have two or three committee chairmen saying, "Fine; may we meet while the Senate is sitting?" So I raise Senator Lafond's request as a matter of principle. If the Senate does wish to give the committee permission to sit, I will not throw a tantrum about it, but in general I want to encourage committee chairmen to arrange their meetings so that they take place on a day when the Senate is to sit, of course, but not while the Senate is actually sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 29, the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled They Served—We Care, tabled in the Senate on October 20, 1981.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at any length on this report to the Senate by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. Indeed, it is not necessary to do so, as the report speaks for itself and is very readable, and to supplement it, as it were, we have heard excellent speeches by three members of the committee who participated in its preparation. I do, however, want to congratulate the committee on its fine work. The recommendations they made are certainly worthy of support, and when enacted into legislation will be of great benefit to veterans and the spouses of veterans.

I think, too, the report shows how beneficial it is to take the time to make such a study. Over the years, conditions change, and amendments to legislation, while worthy in themselves, may result in some persons being unintentionally favoured over others. I think this is so well set out in the opening paragraph of the report that I would like to quote it:

The Pension Act has been amended since its inception on 7 July 1919 to keep it up-to-date with changes in the social and economic conditions of veterans. There are, however, a number of areas of concern which have not commanded much attention in the past but which are important today because the majority of veterans are now reaching an age where disabilities and the decreasing capacity to cope with them due to the passage of time, are a serious and growing burden. This burden to a large extent is shared by the veterans' spouses. These spouses have loyally and conscientiously taken care of the incapacitated veterans for a great many years, giving them the affection, security and support they need and enabling them to stay in their own homes instead of in institutions. Although there are a number of spouses who are the husbands of disabled veterans most of them are aging women.

As has been mentioned, the report goes on to deal with the payment of proportionate pensions to spouses; the continuation of pensions at the married rate to the spouse of a deceased pensioner; indexation of the basic pension; the delay in processing pension applications and in pension adjudication; the War Veterans Allowance Act; the Civilian War Pensions and Allowance Act; and the residence requirement for veterans. All these are dealt with very well in the report and in the speeches already given, so I do not propose to do more than mention them except in one regard.

I do want to say, however, that I was especially pleased with the recommendation concerning the continuation of pensions at the married rate to the spouse of a deceased pensioner. Certainly, if a pensioner dies, his widow may face a very difficult time. While I knew this, of course, it was impressed upon me again just recently. A pensioner and his wife, whose family were all grown and away from home, lived quite comfortably in a modest way. The pensioner died and consequently the widow had a sharply reduced income. Yet her expenses, apart from groceries, were no less, and will increase as the general cost of living continues to increase. So, honourable senators, it will be a great help to people like this if the recommendation of the committee in this regard is accepted and acted upon without delay.

I was particularly interested in the recommendation concerning delays in the processing of pension applications, and of pension adjudications. I have been critical of these delays in the past, and it may be that such criticism was unfair, in whole or in part. The report is also critical of these delays, and on page 7 gives three examples of extraordinary delays. I quote the recommendation of the committee in this regard:

We recommend that all necessary steps be taken immediately to eliminate the unacceptable delays in processing pension applications and in pension adjudications which have accumulated since 1970 and that to this end, particular consideration be given to encouraging essential staff to continue working beyond the normal age of retirement.

I was somewhat surprised when Senator Marshall appeared to claim that much of the delay was due to lack of secretarial help.

Honourable senators, to be fair to the Pension Commission, I would like to read from a letter to Senator Frith from the then Minister of Veterans Affairs. You may recall that Senator Frith undertook to bring my comments on Bill C-82 to the attention of the minister. He did so, and the letter I am reading from is the reply of the minister. It is dated August 13 of this year, and says, in part:

Senator Macdonald expressed concern about certain aspects of the administration of pension benefits for former members of the forces and their surviving dependants. I have discussed his concerns with the Chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission.

The Chairman has seen the relevant copy of the Senate debates and has commented as follows:

Senator Macdonald asked whether because of the number of new claims for widows' pensions which will now be received as a result of the provisions of Bill C-82, claims for disability pensions will of necessity be neglected. The answer is that the Commission is fully prepared to deal with the applications for proportionate pensions and that such action will have absolutely no adverse effect upon applications for disability pensions or full widows' pensions based on the claim that death was the result of service or that the veteran should have been granted pension at a rate of 48 per cent or higher in his lifetime. In these latter cases a considerable amount of medical and other research must be done to determine whether the veteran is pensionable. In the proportionate pension claims, the Commission has organized a separate unit and relatively little research is required. It has been the experience of the Commission, with respect to the proportionate pensions which became available to widows on 1 October, 1980, that the claims were processed on the average within 60 days of receipt.

● (1530)

If I have unjustly criticized the Commission, honourable senators, I certainly take back that criticism.

The Chairman of the Pension Commission goes on further to say:

There are some errors or misconceptions in Senator Macdonald's statement. One such misconception is that most veterans must wait up to four years to obtain their first pension cheques.

Honourable senators, I must say here that he misunderstood my words because I did not say "most veterans"; I said "some pensioners", as does the report.

While at the present time the Commission and the Pension Review Board are taking longer than any of us would like to reach their decisions and action is being taken to reduce the time lag, it should be remembered that of the approximately 5,500 to 6,000 applications now received annually at the first level by the Commission, over the years, the Commission has, by dint of the care and research which it undertakes, been able to grant 41 per cent of these claims. These decisions currently take just under a year. It is hoped this time will be reduced substantially. Those which are not granted may be appealed to an Entitlement Board of the Commission. Of those so appealed about 23 per cent are granted. Claims rejected at this level may be further appealed to the Pension Review Board, which is completely independent of the Commission. Of the 1,168 claims heard by that Board in the fiscal year 1980-81, it granted 163 in whole or in part. This means that 54 per cent of the applications received at the first level were successful at some stage of the proceeding, but it also means that fewer than 3 per cent of those same applicants had to wait anywhere near four years to receive favourable decisions.

He goes on further to say that:

The figures attributed to the Chairman of the Commission in the newspaper article quoted by the senator are incorrect. No such statistics were given by me to the reporter and I am not aware of the source of those quoted.

Honourable senators, I have quoted from that letter at length simply to be fair to the commission and to the work it is doing.

Hon. Jack Marshall: You are too kind.

Senator Macdonald: If by chance I had been unduly critical, I should like to set the record straight. At the same time, however, I am far from convinced that these applications cannot be processed in a much shorter time.

Senator Marshall: Right!

Senator Macdonald: I think one way to do this is to have more commissioners. At the present time, the act provides that the commission will consist of not less than eight commissioners, but the Governor in Council can increase this number to 14 and the Governor in Council may, from time to time, appoint not more than 10 additional ad hoc commissioners, which would make the total 24. I believe this has been done. I suggest, honourable senators, that the Pension Act be amended to allow more commissioners to be appointed and, if considered necessary, the number of members of the Pension Review Board also to be increased.

At the present time, if I remember correctly, the act provides for a chairman, a deputy chairman and three other members. Two additional ad hoc members can be appointed to the commission by the Governor in Council. I would suggest that the Governor in Council be given authority to appoint as many as is thought necessary in order to deal with the backlog of cases awaiting a decision. I do not think the number should be restricted to seven, as I understand it now is.

Honourable senators, before I continue with my speech I should like to repeat that I believe we owe a great debt of gratitude to the members of the committee for their work in preparing this report.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: They should have the satisfaction of knowing that their report, if adopted, will mean a great deal to many veterans and the widows of veterans.

I believe those who served in the Canadian forces in wartime—especially in World War I and World War II—were called upon by Canada to give extraordinary service, service which might have resulted in death, physical disability or mental disability. I believe that by the Pension Act and other statutes that benefit veterans and their dependents, Canada is only compensating them in an ordinary way for extraordinary service. It is my belief that no person who served in the Canadian forces should ever be in want.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: I believe a grateful country should provide not only for the dependants of those who died in wartime, but also for those who suffered physical or mental disability.

I suppose we are all familiar with people who are now making application for pensions based on the effects of injuries suffered in the war of 1939-1945. Simple justice demands that veterans should have special attention. They earned it, and they earned it the hard way.

Of course, honourable senators, when veterans apply for pensions 30 to 35 years after the end of the war, as many are doing, the question is asked whether the injury complained of is as a result of war service. We all know that even a minor injury incurred when one is young can come back, as it were, and can be much worse when one becomes older.

I understand that most of the applications now received deal with problems related to aging. The commission feels that it has to find out whether such ailments as arthritis, rheumatism or back injuries were the result of, or aggravated by, war service. The Canadian system helps the veteran to prove his case, for which it provides free legal services and the like. Personally, I do not believe this is sufficient. The system demands that the veteran prove his case. Perhaps I should mention here that there is a "benefit of the doubt" clause in the present Pension Act. It says this:

The provisions of this Act shall be liberally construed and interpreted to the end that the recognized obligation of the people and Government of Canada to provide compensation to those members of the forces who have been disabled or have died as a result of military service and to the dependants, may be fulfilled.

That is good as far as it goes, but to my mind it does not go nearly far enough. You will note that the burden of proof is on the veteran to prove his case. Under the act, assistance is provided for him to try to do so. I believe it should be the other way around. I believe that the burden of proof should be on the commission to prove that the veteran is not entitled to a pension. I do not say this simply because the commission, with the vast powers of the government behind it, is in a better position to seek out witnesses who were in service with the applicant. I do not say this because it may not be possible for a veteran to prove that his arthritis, for example, was caused by, perhaps, a long forgotten war injury. I believe our veterans are, as a matter of right and simple justice, entitled to a pension, if they now have a physical or mental disability. If the Pension Commission or others say otherwise, then let them prove it and take the burden of proof away from the now aging veterans.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, at this time of year we honour the 109,980 Canadian service men and women of the First and Second World Wars, who lie buried or commemorated in the 74 countries from Russia to Australia where Canadian graves are to be found. I believe we can best honour our dead by taking action, by taking exceptional care of those who have survived and who need our care.

Honourable senators, while the report does not go as far as I would like to see it go, nevertheless, I realize that the committee wanted to make recommendations beneficial to veterans and their spouses and other dependants which could be enacted without controversy. I believe we all owe a debt of gratitude and a debt of appreciation to the members of the committee for the very fine report they have presented. While we thank them, I know that the thanks they really want to be given is to see the recommendations they have made become part of our veterans legislation. I hope their desires in that respect will soon be realized so that then we can in all truth say, "They Served—We Care."

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NEWFOUNDLAND

DEVELOPMENT OF HYDRO POWER AND OFFSHORE OIL RESOURCES—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Cook calling the attention of the Senate to certain matters relating to the development of hydro power in Labrador, and to the development of the offshore oil resources of Newfoundland.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I had intended to speak to this motion, but in view of the discussions which are now taking place between the federal government and the Government of Newfoundland I think our interests would be better served if the motion were put off until after the Christmas recess. In other words, I think the motion should be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are you saying that Senator Cook is in agreement with that desire?

Senator Marshall: I have not actually spoken to Senator Cook, but I am sure he would not mind, because a great deal of new evidence will then be available.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I suggest that the matter stand until next week and that in the meantime Senator Marshall and Senator Cook see if they can agree on how it should be dealt with?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Order stands.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, May 27, 1981 the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "Child at Risk," tabled in the Senate on October 16, 1980.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I should like to draw your attention today to resources—natural resources, both renewable and non-renewable; not mining or fishing or forestry or energy, but our most valuable resource: our people, and, most particularly, our children. They are renewable in the context of each generation; they are non-renewable in that each individual baby, each spark of life, is treasure with a value far beyond that of gold as each baby starts its journey through life in this world.

The Senate owes a debt of gratitude to Senator Bonnell and his committee for undertaking the investigation, and it owes particular gratitude to Senator McGrand for his determination and tenacity as chairman of the subcommittee. The study itself was particularly appropriate for the Senate as its contribution to the International Year of the Child.

If I may just refresh your memories, the Order of Reference said:

That the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into and report upon such experiences in prenatal life and early childhood as may cause personality disorders or criminal behaviour in later life and to consider and recommend such remedial and preventive measures relating thereto as may be reasonably expected to lead to a reduction in the incidence of crime and violence in society;

In other words, are criminals made or are criminals born? The conclusions reached indicate that they are both.

In summary, paragraph 157, at page 55 of the report, states:

It is now possible to define groups of children at risk of developing criminal behaviour. It is by identifying such at-risk groups and by counteracting the non-genetic factors which we know to be harmful that maximum benefit can result from our investment in programs of prevention, health education, intervention and treatment.

From this follow the committee's practical and down-to-earth recommendations. I am interested in what the Senate can do to implement those recommendations, and I have a few suggestions. I would be pleased if you would consider them.

My first suggestion is that the Senate request that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science identify and list the priority recommendations in the report that are within the Senate's scope.

My second suggestion is that the Senate ask the committee to correlate recommendations of the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy having to do with medical research, social research and technical developments with the recommendations of the Child at Risk report. You have to realize that under Senator Bonnell the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science was more or less the grandfather of both the Science Policy report and the Child at Risk report.

My third suggestion is that the Senate be most vigilant when assessing any legislation that comes before it that might affect the well-being of infants. I can cite a string of examples of such legislation, and I am sure you could think of other examples. For instance, there are amendments to the Criminal Code and to such acts as the Food and Drugs Act, the National Housing Act, the Indian Act, the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Broadcasting Act, all of which might have some bearing on the well-being of infants.

The fourth suggestion I wish to make is that we should originate legislation in the Senate that does not call upon the public purse. In referring to the particular amendments that would come under that suggestion, I will be dealing with specific recommendations in the Child at Risk report. For instance, dealing with possible amendments to the Criminal Code, the committee made the following recommendation on page 55 of the report:

We recommend that the Government of Canada review offences in the Criminal Code that are relevant to child abuse, with a view to determining whether shifting the burden of proof, as is presently done in a number of sections of the Code (e.g., sections 306-309), should also be applied to offences against children where the Crown proves that the child in question was under the care and custody of the accused at the time of the alleged offence, and that the harm to the child was such that would not, in the ordinary course of events, have occurred accidentally.

Another amendment to the Criminal Code which could be sponsored by the Senate is mentioned in paragraph 26 on page 58 of the report, where it states:

We recommend that Section 43 of the Criminal Code of Canada entitled "Correction of Children by Force" and similar provisions in provincial and territorial legislation be reconsidered by Federal, Provincial and Territorial Governments in view of the sanction which this type of provision gives to the use of violence against children.

We could also suggest amendments to the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act and the Food and Drugs Act. I mention the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act because I had the honour to sponsor the bill in the Senate, and I feel it is one of the best such pieces of legislation in the western world. However, it is probably time to revise it, particularly with regard to labelling and nutrition. On page 10 of the report it says:

MALNUTRITION—"The single and most important developmental factor which determines the outcome of human pregnancy is maternal-fetal nutrition."

Honourable senators, I would like to tell you about two programs which are very much along the lines of the recommendations of the committee. One such program goes by the initials "ETC", which stand for the Society for Exploring Television with Children; and the other is called "Native Indian Infant Stimulation Program."

The committee made certain recommendations with regard to television. Paragraph 16, on page 56 of the report, states:

We recommend that the Canadian Radio and Television Commission

- a) accept high quality, imported programs for children as Canadian content;
- b) when holding public hearings into granting or renewing television licences, raise the question of excessive violence on television, its effects, and possible remedies to control it; and
- c) continue to ensure adherence to high standards with regard to advertising on children's programs.

The committee continues, in paragraph 17, on page 57:

We recommend that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and private television and cable television companies

- a) adopt a policy to reduce the amount of violence portrayed in television programs during hours when children might be expected to be watching television; and
- b) provide high quality, non-violent and indigenously Canadian programs for preschool and school children and provide adequate publicity for them.

Let me describe some of the programming of the Society for Exploring Television with Children. These programs are produced locally on Vancouver Island for children, by children from school districts 68 and 69, and it is an extracurricular activity. The aim of the Society for Exploring Television with Children is to provide a positive, enriching experience in which children's creativity can be encouraged and demonstrated. The ages of the children involved range between 8 and 14 years. I realize that these children are older than the age groups with which we are dealing in Child at Risk, but we cannot overlook the influence of television. These youngsters select and research the topics, co-write the scripts and create skits. They act, interview and operate the video equipment.

Another recommendation, set out in paragraph 22, on page 57 of the report, is the use of volunteers, as is the case with the Society for Exploring Television with Children. The society receives cooperation from the community—from Cable West T.V., the Audio-Visual Department at Malaspina College, various members of the community who have business interests, talented actors, people who are familiar with electronic equipment, and so on. The programs are aired on local channels at suitable hours, and they are available in the local elementary schools.

I would like to give some examples of these programs. These youngsters have created a series called "Preparing for Christmas". One program in the series involved an inspector from the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, who told of the pitfalls and benefits of giving pets for Christmas. He brought along suitable pets, and the interview was conducted by a child. Another program was entitled "How to make spoon and peg dolls." Another gave directions on how to make nativity sets from clay, and yet another on how to make Christmas wreaths and decorations. Another series was entitled "Kids look at Hospitals and Doctors," which was very successful and, I am sure, left those youngsters who watched the program with a much more positive attitude towards doctors and hospitals. One program was called "ETC Explores the RCMP." The Mounties who were interviewed by the children outlined how the force could be of help to them, how children could protect themselves and so on, and it was very well received.

The funding for such programs is always a problem. In many cases such operations are hand-to-mouth, but very much in line with the recommendations with regard to do-it-yourself on a community basis.

The second program which I would like to talk about is the Native Indian Infant Stimulation Program. This program is a prime example of what the committee is recommending.

At page 55, paragraph 11, the committee says:

We recommend that Provincial and Territorial Governments establish or expand in-home support services for parents, and in particular that they

- a) establish or expand health visitor programs to offer in-home assistance to parents and/or children identified as being at risk; and
- b) require health visitors to monitor the quality of child care and to offer to teach inexperienced parents the rudiments of child care if necessary.

Subparagraphs (d) and (e) of paragraph 22, on page 57, read:

We recommend that the Federal Government, Provinces, Territories and municipalities . . .

d) make maximum use of voluntary as well as professional staff; and

e) provide disadvantaged and handicapped children with specialized "head start" programs.

Let me just say a few words about the Native Indian Infant Stimulation Program. For a number of years Indian leaders, as well as non-Indian educators, have worried about the difficult time Indian children face in our school system. Their high drop-out rate has meant that they will have fewer opportunities as adults. Out of 900 recent area high school graduates on Vancouver Island, only one was an Indian. Five Indian bands on Vancouver Island—the Chemainus, Penelakut, Halalt, Cowichan and Malahat—have developed the Native Indian Infant Stimulation Program. The aim of this program is to better prepare young children for entrance to primary school. As such, it concentrates on the most intensive learning period of human development—the period from birth to four years.

The program began when the Band Councils made a joint proposal to the Department of Employment and Immigration for funds to train Indian women who could then work in the home with the children's parents. Malaspina College, in Nanaimo, set up a training course of six months' study followed by two months' supervised practicum. Thirteen young Indian women completed the first course and were ready to work in their local communities.

The four basic objectives of the program are: To help parents understand the basic principles of normal growth and development; to increase the parents' skill in stimulating their children so that they can have the maximum opportunity for physical, emotional and intellectual growth; to give parental support and guidance and to act as a link between the family and community resources; and to give Indian parents an understanding and awareness of traditional child-rearing practices.

Elders from the Indian community helped in the training so that the traditional values were combined with modern development ideas.

I am sure honourable senators will be surprised to discover the source of the following quotation:

Talk to your baby from the very start—this way you will not be a stranger to your baby and he has a sense of belonging. Talking to your baby also helps him to grow and develop. Communication is a good tool for health, growing and learning.

This may sound like modern advice for parents but, in actual fact, this quotation is an excerpt from an "Old Ways of the Indian People" booklet which was part of the training material used by the young graduates of the program. Traditional Indian wisdom regarding child care is applicable and valuable in today's world.

One young graduate of this program remarked:

A lot of parents are young—

In fact, many of them are teenagers.

They do not realize that for a child to speak you have to speak to him and not at him. You don't just feed him; you can talk to him at the same time. More and more mothers are beginning to realize they have smart children.

One enthusiastic father spoke of the support infant stimulation workers had given to him and his wife. Another family pointed to the possibility for early diagnosis of problems when they, perhaps, can more easily be corrected. As one band member put it:

It does not matter how much money we put in late, it cannot make up for early failure.

The awareness that from birth to four years of age is the most critical period in child development will come as no surprise to those who were members of the committee. It is gratifying to note that this concept is the key to the Native Indian Program.

The Honourable Monique Bégin, Minister of National Health and Welfare, is enthusiastic about the program, and it is to be hoped—if the evaluation by the University of Victoria at the end of three years is favourable—that it will be used as a prototype in other parts of the country.

In the meantime, however, the program is in jeopardy for want of $92,984 for project workers' salaries. Over the past year salaries have been paid from the Community Development Program of Canada Manpower and Immigration. This grant is paid on a declining scale over a three-year period, hence the current shortfall. It is to be hoped that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will come to the rescue. It will be heartbreaking and wrong if the program fails simply because there is no bureaucratic place for it. Financial support, which covers other than the payment of salaries, has come from charitable foundations such as the Samuel and Saidye Bronfman Foundation, the Vancouver Foundation, as well as from the Secretary of State, Malaspina College, and the University of Victoria.

Honourable senators, if we keep in mind that our children are our most valuable resource, this report will not be allowed to gather dust. A very wise man, Jesus of Nazareth, once said:

Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Honourable senators, I commend Senator McGrand and the members of the committee for their efforts in preparing this very valuable report, Child at Risk.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, November 9, at 8 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government.

From the events that took place last Thursday and what has happened since, it has been possible to piece together some of the circumstances which led the nine provincial premiers and the federal Prime Minister to reach an agreement on a resolution to be submitted for patriation of the Constitution, on an amending formula and on the partial and conditional entrenchment of a Charter of Rights. Today, the Premier of Quebec, in his speech at the opening session of the National Assembly, indicated that this agreement, involving, as I said before, the federal Prime Minister and nine of the ten provincial premiers, appeared to have been negotiated through the night of Wednesday to Thursday last week, while neither he nor his representatives were in attendance and that he was informed of this agreement Thursday morning, without having had an opportunity to take part in the discussion.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government is able to confirm this version or, if he cannot confirm it, could he tell me exactly what happened?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

• (2010)

As honourable senators are aware, the process of arriving at a substantial consensus was a long one, and one which necessitated several meetings involving federal and provincial ministers, the Prime Minister and the premiers, as well as federal and provincial officials and others. As to the exact chronology, I think it would be best if I sought that information to make certain that the exact record is presented to all honourable senators.

I do have further information regarding the constitutional agreement signed by the federal government and the nine provincial governments. This information is in response to questions asked a few days ago by the Leader of the Opposition and other honourable senators. At that time I noted the questions asked and now have some information in reply to them.

In response to certain of the Leader of the Opposition's questions, I can confirm that the referendum clause in the amending formula has, indeed, been deleted, and the veto of the Senate would become a 180-day suspensive veto on all constitutional matters.

In response to Senator Flynn's third question, Premier Lévesque also had reservations concerning mobility rights. Quebec did not want to give up its right to control what it feels is exclusively within its jurisdiction.

In response to the questions asked, I believe, by Senator Manning as to which procedure relating to the Joint Address from the Parliament of Canada will be adopted, and when the matter will again come before Parliament, neither question has been decided as yet. The Prime Minister would like to consult fully with the leaders of the opposition parties on the first point and, hopefully, reach an agreement. It is my understanding that that meeting will probably take place this week.

Honourable senators, may I say that, when the results of that meeting are made known, I hope that we can then have similar meetings involving the Senate leadership so that we can discuss our procedure in this chamber.

On the second point, the government would like to give the Province of Quebec some time to discuss an accommodation in areas that concern it, so that Quebec, too, can be a party to patriating the Constitution.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the leader mind repeating that last sentence? I did not quite get it.

Senator Perrault: The government would like to give the Province of Quebec some time to discuss an accommodation—a mutually acceptable accommodation—in areas that concern it, so that Quebec, too, can be a party to patriating the Constitution.

Senator Roblin, in his questions, correctly interpreted the changes in the Charter of Rights in relation to the "notwithstanding" clause.

In response to Senator Flynn's question on this point, the so-called "notwithstanding" clause, clause 33, would not apply to all sections of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The "notwithstanding" clause applies only to: Section 2, which concerns fundamental freedoms; sections 7 to 15, which concern legal and equality rights; and section 28, which provides that rights be guaranteed equally to both sexes. The "notwithstanding" clause, therefore, does not apply to: Democratic rights, contained in sections 3 to 5; mobility rights, contained in section 6; official languages rights, found in sections 16 to 22; minority language educational rights, found in section 23; enforcement, found in section 24; and the general provisions of the charter, found in sections 25 to 31—excepting section 28, which I have already mentioned. Section 32, concerning the application of the charter, is also not affected by clause 33.

In response to Senator Deschatelets' question as to whether arrangements have been made to hold meetings at the ministerial level, the answer is that no meetings have been scheduled as yet. It is, however, the intention of the national government to try to reach an agreement with the Province of Quebec on this accord. In fact, I can report, honourable senator, that last Friday and again today, the Honourable Jean Chrétien proposed that Quebec and the federal government meet on this question. As yet, there has been no response from the Government of Quebec.

In response to the question asked by Senator Buckwold, section 3(c) refers to the section referring to the application of minority language rights in each province. I would hesitate to offer further interpretation on the marginal note the honourable senator referred to in his question.

• (2015)

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, with regard to the three main dissenting points which Premier Lévesque mentioned at the end of the conference last Thursday, it seems that he has the support, in principle, of the official opposition in Quebec, Mr. Ryan having sent a telegram to Premier Lévesque and Prime Minister Trudeau.

If I heard the leader correctly, he said that Mr. Chrétien suggested that there should be a meeting, but he has had no reply.

I would like to know what kind of invitation Mr. Chrétien extended to Mr. Lévesque. Was it merely through his speech in Calgary, or was it a direct invitation to the Premier of Quebec in this connection? Was there any indication that Mr. Ryan's suggestions were considered favourably?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that the communication was a private initiative by the Honourable Jean Chétien, and that the offer to meet was not merely stated in a public forum as part of a speech. However, further information will be sought on that point.

As far as Mr. Ryan's views are concerned, I understand that the entire Liberal caucus in the province of Quebec has expressed its general support of the proposals which were negotiated with the provinces.

Senator Flynn: Where did you get that information?

Senator Perrault: The information was provided to me this afternoon, honourable senators, but the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: I prefer that undertaking, because it seems to me that it is hard to reconcile the affirmation of the Leader of the Government that the Quebec caucus is in favour of the entire position of the federal government when you have the text of Mr. Ryan's telegram which says that something should be done about Mr. Lévesque's three main objections.

Senator Perrault: Mr. Ryan obviously has not rejected this accord outright.

Senator Flynn: I know that.

Senator Perrault: He says there is far more good than bad in it, and he looks forward to good negotiations with the Province of Quebec. I think honourable senators can draw encouragement from the fact that Mr. Chrétien has been endeavouring to contact the Government of Quebec to discuss possible changes or accommodations.

A few weeks ago there were many in the opposition who felt it would be impossible for the federal government to achieve any kind of agreement with the provinces, and a few days ago we saw agreement reached with nine of the provinces. Surely, it is not out of the question that the process will be completed?

Senator Flynn: I am glad to hear that, and I hope that the Prime Minister will tell some of his ministers to assume the conciliatory attitude adopted by the Leader of the Government here. I am referring particularly to ministers like the Honourable Mr. Ouellet and some of his kind.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That is an unfounded statement.

Senator Flynn: No; I heard him.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government on the Constitution. Honourable senators, today I read in Le Journal de Montréal dated Monday, November 9, 1981, on page 5, an article which refers to "a lie" by the federal government,—I shall quote a few lines as a premise to my question:

The Federal Government is "lying" when it says it is prepared to negotiate with Quebec notwithstanding the constitutional agreement signed last Thursday by Ottawa and the nine other provinces, according to the Quebec Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

And the article quotes:

"When they say they want to negotiate, it is a lie, it is not true, the agreement is already signed", said Mr. Claude Morin yesterday afternoon a few hours before leaving Quebec City to go to Paris.

Of course, the Prime Minister is often being criticized for travelling outside the country. However, it seems that Quebec ministers do travel outside their province too.

My question is this. I watched the televised closing of the conference, and if I am correct, Prime Minister Trudeau offered the Lévesque government the option of continuing negotiations on certain clauses in order to reach a unanimous agreement. Now here is Claude Morin, who was at the conference in Victoria in 1971, in similar circumstances, when Mr. Bourassa said yes one evening and no the next day, here is Claude Morin saying once more that the Prime Minister of Canada is a liar, a patent liar.

Senator Flynn: That is not what you quoted!

Senator Leblanc: Sure, that is what he said, that it was a lie.

Senator Flynn: That is not what you quoted.

Senator Leblanc: He did not say "patent" but he said a couple of times that it was a lie, that it was not true. Now, I want to know whether we really want to go on—

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator Leblanc: Please let me continue, Honourable Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: I would let you ask a question but—

Senator Leblanc: But you are interrupting!

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Flynn: I would let you ask a question, but a speech is another thing.

Senator Leblanc: Well, I don't interrupt when you are talking. I happen to have the floor right now and I would like to keep it if you don't mind.

Senator Flynn: I object, Mr. Speaker. The Honourable Senator Leblanc is trying to make a little speech. If he wants to do that, he can, but there is a time and a place for everything. Right now, this is the Question Period.

Senator Leblanc: Sure it's the Question Period. I am asking a question! In fact, I am asking a question further to the questions you asked about the Constitution and I think this is entirely in accordance with the Rules of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Leblanc: I want to know whether we really want to negotiate, yes or no?

Senator Flynn: You should have asked that in the first place; I have asked this question myself.

● (2020)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, during the course of the prolonged constitutional discussions, the government demonstrated a great deal of flexibility. The Prime Minister has been most forthcoming in his attitude towards all of the provinces—I believe events have borne that out—and stated, on the final day of the Ottawa meetings, that he looked forward to meeting with representatives of the Government of Quebec to discuss clarification of the concerns of the Quebec government. He also expressed the hope, as the honourable senator has stated so correctly, that an accommodation could be achieved. Clearly, at this point in time the situation requires and suggests the need for more light and rather less heat.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Perrault: We are looking forward to a constructive discussion of the outstanding differences with the Province of Quebec. The Prime Minister stated that publicly, and both publicly and privately the same sentiment has been expressed by the Honourable Jean Chrétien. Hopefully, in the next few hours, some communication of a constructive nature can be received from the Province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Well then, that would mean that, in these circumstances, if someone accuses the Prime Minister of being a liar, the person who accuses the Prime Minister of being a liar is a liar himself.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Perhaps Claude Morin was misquoted in the newspaper.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: It is very easy to accuse someone, as Senator Leblanc is doing. But it is highly irregular, and I think it certainly does not serve the cause of Canadian unity—the cause of the Liberal Party and the cause of the Prime Minister, perhaps, but not Canada's.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Senator Leblanc asked a question.

Senator Flynn: He offered his conclusion.

Senator Leblanc: I think—

Senator Flynn: Just listen to him. I do not think it is very useful to listen to that kind of talk, but listen anyway if you want to understand.

Senator Denis: Don't answer for him.

Senator Leblanc: I think it is important, at this point, to point out that I was not espousing a cause, except that they are accusing—

Senator Flynn: Come on—

Senator Leblanc:—except that in a newspaper they are quoting Claude Morin, who is responsible for federal-provincial relations in Quebec, and they are quoting him as having said that the Prime Minister of Canada is a liar, because he offered to negotiate. Mr. Morin said this was not true. I think it is important to mention this point this evening, in spite of what the Leader of the Opposition thinks—

Senator Denis: I agree.

Senator Flynn: I object most strenuously to the way Senator Leblanc has gone about this. First of all, he amputated the text, because Claude Morin said that if negotiating was being mentioned, it was a lie; he did not say that the Prime Minister was a liar. Some people might like to say so, but he did not.

Furthermore, Senator Leblanc went on to say that if the Prime Minister was not a liar, then Claude Morin was one. There is no justification for this deduction either, and I must say it is highly irregular and unworthy of Senator Leblanc to proceed in this fashion.

Hon. Louis Robichaud: Is this a question?

Senator Flynn: I didn't mention the word question, I am talking about clarification—there is a difference. Senator Robichaud, who was premier for 10 years, should know the difference between a point of order and a question. He ought to know that. It seems to me he is big enough to understand.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: That was not very nice!

● (2025)

[English]

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, may I continue with the Leader of the Government on this point concerning the negotiations between the federal government and Quebec, and say that I heard him speak of the Minister of Justice's desire to discuss with Quebec possible changes and accommodations. I want to know if that is a limited proposal or not. I have presumed all along that the negotiations, if there are to be any, would be concentrated on the three points of difference that the Province of Quebec has now stated, and I would like to have the minister confirm that that indeed is what the meetings are going to be about. If it is possible at some stage to produce the correspondence, then that would, of course, clarify the matter completely.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice. The official words provided for me to present to the Senate on this question were in terms of discussion of an accommodation in areas that concern Quebec, and there are three areas of concern, as I recall. I would, therefore, presume that those will be the three areas that were mentioned rather prominently by the Premier of Quebec in last week's consultations. I will, however, take the question as notice.

Senator Roblin: Obviously it becomes a matter of some importance if it is decided to go beyond those. I presume that the government has some understanding with the other nine provinces with respect to these matters, because obviously they are concerned in it. I would like to know what brief the Prime Minister has from the other provinces in this respect.

Senator Perrault: That is a good question, honourable senators. It can be said, however, that most of the provincial first ministers expressed their great desire to find some way to accommodate the concerns of the Province of Quebec, and many have issued public statements to that effect. They hope that some accommodation can be achieved.

Senator Roblin: I was about to tell my honourable friend my proposal as to how to solve the language question, but I will save that until I find out if they can solve it themselves without any help from me.

Honourable senators, I would like to ask another question. This has to do with the situation of the native people—Métis, Eskimo, and other groups.

I have in my hand the communiqué which refers to the rights of aboriginal people. I am really not at all clear about what it means, if anything at all. I presume from this that the statement means that clause 36(2), under the heading "Participation of Aboriginal People", is to be struck. This being so, what takes its place, and what is the meaning of the item that has been introduced to change the position of the aboriginal people from that outlined in the original document?

Senator Perrault: Senator Austin, as a Privy Councillor, has been assigned some responsibilities in the area of aboriginal peoples, and perhaps he may like to reply on this point.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin's question is rather general in nature, and I may not be successful in reaching the nub of his inquiry by my answer. I will make the effort, however. No doubt he will have a supplementary question, if it turns out that I have not been successful.

The negotiations that took place last week resulted in the dropping of clause 34 of the joint resolution, which was a general statement that aboriginal rights existed for the Indian, Métis, and Inuit peoples. Section 34 was dropped at the insistence of the provinces, and with the greatest reluctance on the part of the federal government and the Prime Minister.

● (2030)

Senator Roblin: I know that it has been dropped, and I will not enter into a debate with my honourable friend as to whether he agrees with the dropping of it. He obviously does, or he would not be sitting where he is. He may agree with it reluctantly, but he agrees with it, otherwise he would not be there. The question, therefore, of trying to spread the blame around is a little superfluous.

I am asking my honourable friend this question: What is the meaning of section 5 of the communiqué which was given to us the other day?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, of course I accept the result of the negotiation. However, so far as the aboriginal peoples are concerned, I do so with no pleasure whatever. I would rather that the negotiations by the provinces did not require the deletion of that section.

As Senator Roblin is suggesting, what remains is a first ministers' conference, which will not be held by any constitutional provision but by first ministers' agreement—an executive agreement, if you will—which will have on its agenda the question of claims by the aboriginal peoples of Canada for recognition of rights, and no doubt will canvass the nature of those claims and hopefully end in providing some remedy.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Do I understand from what Senator Austin is saying that the conference at which aboriginal rights will be defined or confirmed will not be included in the new resolution?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Tremblay is correct. The matter is not one for inclusion in the joint resolution which may be passed by the Senate and the other place. The matter is one of executive agreement among most of the first ministers, who have agreed that they will meet as first ministers with the matter of aboriginal claims, or rights, if you like, as a main item on their agenda. They have also agreed, as you will no doubt see in the document which is before you, that the aboriginal peoples will be present and will be entitled to participate.

Senator Tremblay: If I remember correctly, honourable senators, in the actual resolution which is before us, the question of the aboriginal rights was mentioned. I do not remember the number of the section, but I think it was there. If it is no longer included in the new resolution—that is, if it has no constitutional status—that is a new change which is not mentioned in the agreement. Is there something of that kind in the agreement? I do not think so. It would be a big change for the aboriginal peoples, because it was mentioned in the actual resolution under the heading "Constitutional Conference" that this question would be on the agenda of that conference. Perhaps I am wrong, because I am speaking from memory, and if so I should like to be corrected.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I will look into the precise placement of the provision. I may stand to be corrected, but I will report to the chamber tomorrow on the question.

Senator Roblin: I wonder if my honourable friend would continue his clarification of this interesting matter, because he has left me more puzzled than when he started. He tells me that section 34 has been eliminated from the document. That is the section which deals with the recognition of aboriginal rights. That is out. If I understand my honourable friend correctly, he is now telling me that the section dealing with the conference on aboriginal rights is no longer part of the Constitution. That is dealt with in clause 36(2), as my colleague Senator Tremblay has outlined. That clause says that a conference shall be convened on the subject of aboriginal rights in accordance with subclause (2) of clause 36 which refers to an annual meeting of the first ministers.

Can the minister tell me if clause 36(2), which makes the conference part of the mandatory proposal under the Constitution, is in or out? If it is out, what has become of the whole of clause 36? Does that mean that the premiers' conference no longer takes place? What happens to clause 36(3), by which the representatives of the Governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories are to be invited to conferences where they are affected?

There are three factors in clause 36. First of all, there is the prime ministerial conference. Then that conference is to invite them, on an annual basis, to discuss constitutional matters affecting the aboriginal peoples under (2), and then, under (3), to invite the representatives of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. My question is: Where do we stand? Is clause 36 in or out, or is it part in and part out?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, although the question is more detailed in nature, it is basically the same question Senator Tremblay asked, and I will endeavour to satisfy both Senator Tremblay and Senator Roblin tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: I wish to direct a question about the Constitution to the Leader of the Government. In view of what has been said about the new amending formula, I presume Part V will be deleted completely. Part V deals with the interim amendment procedure and the rules for its replacement. I presume, too, that Part VI, which deals with the permanent procedures pertaining to the Constitution, will be altered to conform with the agreement that is announced. Are those assumptions right?

Senator Perrault: I am sorry, honourable senators. It was my understanding that the questions were being addressed to my colleague. I must apologize to the honourable senator, and I will take the question as notice.

Senator Roblin: I am happy with that. I wouldn't want to say it all over again anyway.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government if as yet there is any official text of the new resolution?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the text has not yet been made public. When that information comes to hand it will be communicated immediately to the Senate. A working text has been prepared, but it is still being fine-tuned.

Senator Flynn: Has it been distributed to the agreeing premiers?

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Perrault: Yes, it is my understanding that the premiers have a copy of this working text, but the document needs retyping, with some alterations in some of the language, and so on.

Senator Flynn: Has a copy been sent to Premier Lévesque?

Senator Perrault: I will take that question as notice, honourable senators.

Senator Roblin: Surely it must have been.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate say whether section 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms relating to our multicultural heritage remains in the Charter, and whether it is affected by the "notwithstanding" provision?

Senator Perrault: That question will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Now that a consensus has been reached for the patriation of the Constitution, has the leader had any intimation as to whether the dissident senators, having had their fears allayed in this constitutional confrontation, have now expressed the desire to resume their original seats?

Senator Flynn: That's none of your business.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is no group of senators here whom I would term "dissident" senators. I would say that all senators are conscientiously trying to do the best they can for the areas they represent.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary to the question put by Senator Bosa. He says that a consensus has been reached. Is it the opinion of the government that a consensus is reached without the agreement of the Province of Quebec, which represents one-third of the population, and one of the two founding societies, of this country?

• (2040)

Senator Tremblay: One-fourth of the population.

Senator Flynn: Okay, I will settle for 25 per cent.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

HONG KONG VETERANS—POSSIBLE PARASITIC INFESTATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question which will require some preamble. It is with regard to veterans and a front-page story in the Globe and Mail. In my opinion, if the Globe and Mail had not run this story two days before Armistice Day, the item would probably have been relegated to the back page and not received any notice at all.

Evidently, the Americans have discovered that a parasite may be prevalent today in Hong Kong prisoners of war.

A few years ago the Department of Veterans Affairs commissioned a very extensive study of the effects of incarceration on the Hong Kong prisoners of war. The result of that study, after a certain number of years, is that these veterans receive increased benefits. I doubt very much that the Department of Veterans Affairs would be interested in investigating whether the more than 900 Hong Kong prisoners of war still living are infested with this parasite. The only way to clear the matter up is to have the minister make a statement. Statements have been made by his staff, but it is my hope that the Minister of Veterans Affairs can make a statement which can be brought to this chamber, and which will clarify this situation. Certainly, as the situation stands, it is a blight on the department and on those who have supported veterans for so many years.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that there are many among us who read this article in today's Globe and Mail. As yet, I have received no information from the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The question will be taken as notice.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I would just add that if the Vice-President of the Hong Kong Veterans Association of Canada has stated that there is some difficulty, then there must be and he should be supported. There should be some communication between the Leader of the Government and the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I intend to refer this matter to the committee which has just produced the report, They served—We care.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT RATE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Can he give us his impression of the recent figures on unemployment, and can he tell us what plans the government has for dealing with this problem in the immediate future?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, my impression is that the government is distressed by the increase in the unemployment rate. I expect the honourable senator can wait three more days, when the Minister of Finance, who has that responsibility, will be explaining a number of programs in his budget speech.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, is the honourable minister telling us that in three days we will have news to comfort the nearly one million Canadians who are looking for jobs at the present time?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator will have to accept that I am not going to make the budget speech tonight.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Or at any other time.

Senator Olson: That's right.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL—VOLUME OF SHIPMENTS

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, many times in the past the federal government has been criticized for the little use made of the Port of Churchill by the Wheat Board. In a recently published report on this matter the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, of whom I am asking my question, stated that only the Wheat Board has used the port this year.

Would the minister tell us whether he has made proper representations to the various provincial governments asking that they make more use of the Port of Churchill? If the minister has already made such representations, did he do so in writing; and, if not, does he intend to do so in writing, and will he table any such material in the Senate?

I think it is important that some action be taken now, so that next summer the port can be used for shipments other than wheat; and, certainly, usage by the provincial governments should be encouraged.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Guay for his question. I can say that I have written letters to the appropriate ministers in the various provincial governments asking them to be supportive of Port Churchill with regard to its use for commodities other than wheat. The record of the Wheat Board and the federal government with regard to the use of Port Churchill is a long one and one of full support. This year the Canadian Wheat Board shipped 452,000 tonnes of grain through that port, as compared to, I believe, 290,000 tonnes one year ago. This is due to a good crop in western Canada and is as a result of the very large sales, particularly to the Soviet Union and Poland, the two countries which make the greatest use of Port Churchill. I think there is reason for optimism that the output through Churchill next year will exceed 500,000 tonnes.

Although I do not have it with me tonight, I shall be happy to bring to the Senate a copy of the letter I sent to the provincial ministers. If the Senate wishes, I shall table it, and if any senators are interested in having a copy of that letter, I will be very happy to provide it.

Senator Guay: I thank the minister for his answer. Also, I would appreciate it if the minister would bring to our attention the answers he receives from the provincial governments. Many times I have heard the Government of Manitoba complaining that not enough use is made of the Port of Churchill, and that the federal government is not doing enough. It would be most interesting to know how soon the minister receives answers to his letters, and the contents of those answers. Hopefully, we will receive the appropriate answers so that we will know what will be taking place next summer.

Senator Argue: I shall be pleased to keep the honourable senator informed and bring to his attention any replies from the various ministers to whom I have referred.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question on this matter, because it is of interest to me as well as my honourable friend across the way? What traffic studies have been made about the possible use of the Port of Churchill? What bothers me about the statements made regarding that port is the sort of unimpeded optimism about what can be done there. The reason why it is a port at all right now is because the federal government, through its agencies, has the power to ship wheat from it. The only other commodity I know of that is probably in the same category is potash, regarding which the Saskatchewan government might do likewise.

The reason I raise the matter is because I, in a former responsibility, on several occasions looked into the capacity of the Port of Churchill to serve shippers in and out of Manitoba, and found that it was extremely limited. The best we could do was to ship liquor through there.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What kind?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): It would freeze.

Senator Roblin: It was Scotch, and the best we could get, too. One cannot really conceive of making that port profitable on the Scotch traffic because, although a good deal of it is drunk in my province, it is not that much. We in the province of Manitoba found that on a traffic study basis there were very few opportunities to use Churchill for miscellaneous cargoes and things of that sort. It is a problem in Manitoba, but Saskatchewan may be better situated with the potash.

However, I suspect that somewhere in the bowels of the Department of Transport there is a study—they have studies on everything, including VIA Rail, if they would look for it—on the Port of Churchill and the traffic possibilities of that port. I ask my honourable friend to have his colleagues in the Department of Transport search around to see if there is anything there that might give us a lead as to how we can come up with some practical proposals with respect to this matter.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the question is a very specific one and I shall be very happy to comply with the request of the honourable senator, to determine whether any such study has been made and, if so, whether it can be produced.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary. Perhaps at the same time the minister could look into the reasons why the Government of Manitoba stopped bringing liquor in through that port.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I can provide the honourable senator with an answer, if the minister will allow me to serve this function. It was simply a matter of dollars and cents. It was not the most practical way of bringing liquor in. That is the trouble with so many products we try to move through the Port of Churchill; it is simply not economic. That is what happened to the Manitoba Liquor Commission and the Scotch.

Senator Guay: We ought to look into it anyway. I appreciate the answer provided by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, but the fact remains that we ought to receive an answer from the responsible party, the Province of Manitoba. That is the type of answer I would like to get from the minister.

● (2050)

Senator Roblin: Good idea.

Senator Argue: I guess the rule for provincial governments is different from that for the federal government. Apparently, the rule for the provinces is: If it pays, we will use it. The provincial approach seems to be that no matter how much it costs the federal government—even though it may be in the tens of millions of dollars—to upgrade the lines and repair the tracks at Churchill, that is all right, even though the federal government may go in the hole. They seem to feel that, no matter how much it costs, it is the duty of the federal government to support the Churchill line.

Senator Flynn: You never said those things when you were a member of the CCF.

Senator Argue: I am not even arguing against that. It would be really nice if one or more provinces would attempt to utilize Churchill even though money may be lost in the effort. Probably the greatest offender in this regard is the Province of Saskatchewan. The Government of Saskatchewan and others are great supporters of the concept of making better use of Churchill.

Senator Flynn: Saskatchewan has a socialist government.

Senator Argue: It costs the Saskatchewan government $20,000 a year to support the port authority. Port authority officials make great speeches and receive a lot of publicity. Therefore, the Saskatchewan effort, in terms of supporting Churchill, amounts to $20,000 to pay for very important and learned propaganda, but that's all it does.

When you ask governmental officials about the possibility of hauling potash along that line, they say that the line will not take potash in hopper cars or any other kinds of cars. If you point out that the line is good enough to take wheat hopper cars and that perhaps hopper cars carrying potash could be hauled in the same fashion, they tell you that they must study the whole question in terms of exports.

A couple of months ago I had the opportunity personally to interview Mr. MacMurchy, and he said, "Well, you know, Hazen, all this talk about potash through Churchill probably won't lead anywhere because we don't have markets in Europe." Perhaps the provincial governments should be innovative enough to develop some markets in Europe for exports such as potash and then try to use Churchill and put their money where their mouths are.

The Province of Saskatchewan spends $20,000 a year in an effort to prove its friendship with Churchill, whereas the federal government has, by way of grants, lost an investment of something approaching $100 million.

Senator Flynn: Is that why you left the CCF?

Senator Roblin: I am impressed by my honourable friend's remarks because he is well qualified to develop this theme since he has been on both sides of the argument. However, I want to make note of the fact that I doubt that he has heard me make any of those extravagant claims for the development of Churchill which he has just suggested.

My suggestion is that we should get a little closer to what traffic studies of the area will show to be practical, and that includes what kind of investment they will support. If the honourable senator has any information along that line, I would certainly welcome it.

Senator Argue: I will look into the matter.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I would advise Senator Argue not to push too hard for the sale of Saskatchewan potash in Europe, since we will look after that in New Brunswick.

THE CONSTITUTION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Charles McElman: My question is to the Minister of State who has some responsibility with respect to the native peoples. In his reply to Senator Roblin I believe he said that part of the constitutional resolution, which is still before Parliament, would be removed at the request of the provinces. Would he inform this chamber whether this would be done at the request of all the provinces, or some of the provinces; and if it is only some of the provinces, which ones?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): I thank the honourable senator for giving me the opportunity to clarify my answer.

The provisions contained in section 34 were removed at the request of seven provinces; not at the request of the Province of Ontario, the Province of New Brunswick or, so far as I know, the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It was not there during the fateful night.

THE ECONOMY

EXTENSION OF SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised during my absence on November 3 by Senator Muir. I believe that is the only day I have been absent since we reconvened.

The question concerned the extension of the Small Business Development Bond Program. This program is one of the many issues the Minister of Finance could include in his budget on November 12. The honourable senator will understand that I cannot speculate on any announcements which may be part of that budget.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—MEMBERSHIP OF TASK FORCE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised by Senator Asselin on November 3 which concerned representation of the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board.

I would inform the honourable senator that one of the members of the board, Clifford Malone, a past president of Celanese Canada Inc., does bring to the board textile industry experience. I would also add that there is at the present time a vacancy on the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board. It is possible that a spokesman to reflect the textile industry's viewpoint could be appointed to fill this vacant position.

AIRLINES

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE WARDAIR

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on October 28 by Senator Smith concerning the government's air carrier policy.

I would refer the honourable senator to an announcement made on August 14 by my colleague, the Minister of Transport. In this announcement the minister outlined a proposed policy which defines the future roles of Canada's national, regional and local air carriers.

Included in the proposal is a provision which would keep the number of national carriers at two. The Minister of Transport intends to seek comments and suggestions from the provincial and territorial governments, national, regional and local carriers, consumer groups and professional aviation associations before he submits this policy paper to cabinet for approval. As my colleague stated at the time the proposed policy was announced, this policy is intended to guide the operation and future development of scheduled air services in Canada during the 1980s. Therefore, we believe that it is important to obtain the comments of those affected—the users, the carriers and our communities.

I would also add that a comprehensive review of the government's international air policy is in progress and is expected to be completed next year. The outcome of this review will have a bearing on whether any changes are required in the designation of Canadian international scheduled carriers.

With respect to the honourable senator's second question concerning deregulation, may I suggest that, if he has any comments in this regard with respect to Canada's domestic air carrier policy, he consider contacting the Minister of Transport because, of course, he has invited that type of comment.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO KOREA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Muir on October 29 concerning the Prime Minister's visit to Korea.

The purpose of the Prime Minister's trip to South Korea was not to negotiate the specifics of a Candu sale, but to ensure that the Korean government was still interested. As I stated in my earlier reply, AECL and EDC are now compiling a comprehensive technical and financial bid for consideration in the near future by the Korea Electric Company. The question of interest rates will be covered in that bid.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

MINISTER'S ANNOUNCEMENT RE IMMIGRATION QUOTAS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Macquarrie on November 4 regarding Canadian assistance to Somalia refugees.

We are deeply concerned about the plight of the refugees in Somalia, and we are prepared to provide much needed food aid once we are convinced that delivery can be assured.

In the last fiscal year, the Canadian government has responded generously to the needs of Somalia in its refugee crisis. We contributed over $5 million to various international agencies, such as the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the League of Red Cross Societies, as well as providing direct food aid.

CIDA is also examining the proposal from the University of Somalia to upgrade several faculties, including agriculture and veterinary medicine.

There are seven Canadian non-governmental organizations active in refugee relief in Somalia. They are able to provide health services, well drilling, water purification, nutrition education, and so on, as a result of the generosity of Canadian citizens who have contributed well over $2 million to these non-governmental organizations. To date CIDA has committed over half a million dollars to these projects. Many other large-scale non-governmental organizations' proposals are presently being examined by CIDA.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LIMITATION OF PRODUCTION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 4 Senator Thompson asked a question concerning the development of a nuclear bomb by Pakistan.

Canada is deeply concerned about the threat of nuclear proliferation and its destabilizing effects, particularly in South Asia.

Canada supplied Pakistan with the 137-megawatt Karachi Nuclear Power Plant, known as KANUPP, which was commissioned in 1971 under nuclear co-operation agreements negotiated in 1959 and 1965.

Canada effectively terminated nuclear co-operation with Pakistan in December 1976, when that country refused to meet the requirements of our non-proliferation and safeguards policy which had been upgraded in the wake of the 1974 Indian explosion.

● (2100)

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) has the primary responsibility for safeguarding KANUPP under the 1969 Canada-Pakistan-IAEA Trilateral Agreement.

Canada continues to support the IAEA to the extent possible in its efforts to effectively safeguard KANUPP.

Senator Thompson asked another question on November 4 regarding measures taken by Canada to promote nuclear disarmament.

Honourable senators, Canada is in the process of making preparations for participation in the second U.N. Special Session on Disarmament known as UNSSOD II.

Canada is represented on the 78-member preparatory committee by its Ambassador for Disarmament. The committee will hold a further session next May prior to UNSSOD II now expected to begin on June 7. Canadian views on preparations for UNSSOD II were submitted to the U.N. Secretary General last April.

A booklet entitled UNSSOD II and Canada: A Canadian Perspective, is being distributed to assist those wishing to study issues likely to arise at UNSSOD II.

The government has been providing financial assistance for activities related to UNSSOD II, such as the UNSSOD II poster competition, disarmament week activities and various non-governmental conferences.

There is also discussion with non-governmental organizations on UNSSOD II issues through the Department of External Affairs' Consultative Group on Disarmament and Arms Control Affairs.

Canada has contributed financially to the Independent Commission on Disarmament and Security Issues, known as the Palme Commission. Its report is to be issued prior to UNSSOD II.

In addition, Canada supports all efforts to negotiate concrete and verifiable agreements to limit and reduce any type of armament.

On conventional forces, Canada participates in the MBFR (Mutual Balanced Force Reduction) negotiations in Vienna.

Canada also participates in the Committee on Disarmament, the multilateral negotiating body in Geneva, in efforts to conclude a ban on chemical weapons and a comprehensive nuclear test ban.

Canada attaches the utmost importance to the early resumption of the bilateral negotiations between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. on limiting and reducing strategic forces and to the forthcoming talks on long-range theatre nuclear forces.

The successful conclusion of agreements on all these subjects could, in turn, encourage other agreements which, taken together, could be seen as a comprehensive arms control arrangement.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

HOME INSULATION PROGRAMS—INSTALLATION OF UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some further information which was promised in response to questions asked by Senator Muir on October 21, 1981, relating to the important matter of urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

I do not propose to read this document, but ask that it be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

BACKGROUND

The Product

Urea formaldehyde foam insulation (UFFI) is a mixture of urea formaldehyde resin, an acidic hardening agent (usually phosphoric acid) and a propellant (usually compressed air). The material is prepared at the installation site and pumped into the walls of a building where it hardens into a structurally solid foam insulation. The fresh foam contains approximately 75 per cent water by weight. During the curing process following installation, formaldehyde gas is released from the foam.

Urea formaldehyde foam insulation was first developed in the early 1960s. Since then its use has been growing throughout the world. For example, in Germany, the United Kingdom, Sweden, Italy, Switzerland, Spain, France and South Africa it is still being used. Only two countries, Canada and Israel, have withdrawn it from the market; it continues to be available in the United States but it is banned in Massachusetts and Connecticut.

Standards

In late 1977 acting on a request from the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Canadian General Standards Board (CGSB) developed provisional standards for UFFI. The CGSB operates by consensus and the UFFI standards were agreed to by ten industry representatives, nine federal members and four provincial members (B.C., Alberta, Ontario and Quebec). Compliance with the standards is the responsibility of industry. With this standard CMHC then accepted UFFI subject to several conditions, thus UFFI qualified as a product in the government's insulation grant program (CHIP). CMHC put the following conditions/restrictions on the use of UFFI:

- (i) applicators must be trained;
- (ii) a fact sheet was to be handed to consumers before installation;
- (iii) restriction: product not to be used in ceilings, under floors or in basements;
- (iv) to be used only in empty wood stud cavities;
- (v) to be used only in walls in which the foam can dry quickly;

- (vi) to be installed only when outside air is within prescribed temperature limits;
- (vii) that manufacturers form an association.

Hazardous Product

Unfortunately, the product has been installed in homes with brick veneer, aluminum siding and other interior finishes that do not permit the escape of formaldehyde gas to the outdoors.

The effect of formaldehyde is principally as an irritant (eye, nose and throat) but in some cases it can cause an allergic reaction or skin irritation. When first international reports indicated potential health problems with UFFI, the Minister of Health and Welfare Canada, Monique Bégin, took no chances and established an Expert Advisory Committee to make recommendations on potential health problems in connection with UFFI. The Committee's interim report was received in December. It recommended a temporary ban on UFFI. On December 18, 1980 the government acted quickly on these recommendations under authority of the Hazardous Products Act.

The final report of the Expert Advisory Committee received in April 1981 recommended that the ban on UFFI be continued. It said that the ban should be lifted "when and only when industry shows to the satisfaction of appropriate government agencies that a stable and defined product has been developed."

GOVERNMENT PROGRAM OF ACTION

In early June 1981 Cabinet announced that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was named to coordinate the activities of all federal departments in this regard and to manage a program of government action.

1. Information and Coordination Centre

On June 15, 1981 the UFFI Information and Coordination Centre (ICC) was established within the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to provide information to the public, administer a National Testing Survey and coordinate efforts with the provinces.

A toll-free Across Canada Telephone System was set up to enable consumers to register complaints and to receive the latest information on UFFI.

2. Provincial Coordination

Because of provincial government involvement in setting and regulating standards, and because many provinces administer insulation programs of their own, the Honourable André Ouellet telexed his provincial counterparts on June 10, 1981 to inform them of the federal government's initiatives.

Each province was asked to nominate a representative to coordinate activities with the federal government.

At the Federal/Provincial Conference of 1981, the Honourable André Ouellet asked the provincial governments to assume their responsibilities by reminding them of his request made more than a year ago at the Federal/Provincial Conference in Saskatoon. The quotes that follow are an excerpt from the Minister's statement in Saskatoon:

"One product of concern is urea formaldehyde foam-in-place insulation. There have been sufficient consumer complaints of formaldehyde release from this product to prompt concerns about the short and long-term health hazards which may be associated with formaldehyde exposure. These concerns appear to be, in part, associated with improper installation practices. In order to determine the risk of exposure to consumers, the National Research Council is setting up a research program to measure the formaldehyde concentrations in a few homes insulated with the product. To assess the possible toxic effects of breathing the chemical at the level found in homes, the Minister of Health and Welfare Canada has established an Advisory Committee of medical specialists from outside government which is to report prior to the end of November.

Aside from the health aspect, improper application can create a significant economic problem for consumers. Due to the fragmentation found within this industry, consumers are encountering difficulties in recovering costs where deficient installations occur. There are basic resin manufacturers, distributors and formulators of the insulation material and the applicators. The latter are frequently individual operators unable to cope with the corrective costs which may be in the $15,000 to $35,000 range.

We can see product and installation practices are both factors in the hazardous situations which may evolve from both cellulose and urea formaldehyde insulation. Product regulations for cellulose are already in place and banning or product regulation may be necessary with respect to urea formaldehyde, depending on the outcome of studies in progress. In any event, it appears essential that some form of education or licensing be established by the provinces to ensure that applicators are competent to install all types of insulation in a manner that will not expose consumers to undue risks to health or safety due to toxic agents or fire.

I would ask that you convey these thoughts as well as the substance of our discussions to your colleagues responsible for labour practices in your province."

3. National Testing Survey

A National Testing Survey was initiated August 24, 1981 with special priority given to homeowners reporting medical problems or who had experienced uncomfortable levels of formaldehyde vapours in their homes.

The survey will test 2,400 homes (2,000 with and 400 without UFFI) to determine formaldehyde gas levels. As of October 31, 1981 the 2,400 homes have been tested. Laboratory results and a preliminary analysis will be available about mid-November.

4. Publications

A series of three bulletins are published and may be obtained from the UFFI Information Centre:

"UFFI General Information to Homeowners"

"UFFI Information for Medical Doctors"

"UFFI Remedial Measures for Woodframe Construction"

A fourth bulletin "UFFI Testing Procedures" will be available in November.

5. Research

The National Research Council (NRC) is developing an inexpensive device for measuring the amount of formaldehyde vapour in the air.

In addition, NRC's UFFI research program has about twenty research contracts with a dozen Canadian companies. The contracts are to provide information in areas such as: permanent formaldehyde neutralizers in wood, neutralizing UFFI in place using ammonia gas, the effectiveness of remedial measures, structural effects of UFFI and the sensitizing effects of UFFI.

6. Investigation of Public Buildings

Public Works Canada has begun a program to identify those publicly owned, rented or occupied buildings where UFFI has been installed. The Treasury Board Secretariat has informed the Public Service Unions about this investigation.

FUTURE ACTION

Under the Hazardous Products Act a manufacturer may request a Board of Review to appeal the government's decision to ban a product. In February 1981 Energlobe of Philipsburg, Quebec requested such a review. Under the terms of the Act, the government has no choice but to grant the request and a final decision on the product cannot be taken until the Board has ruled. The Board of Review is chaired by Mr. Jacques Lamoureux, a lawyer with the Montreal firm of Lamoureux and Rousseau. The other members are Dr. Benjamin Lu, a professor of chemical engineering at the University of Ottawa and Dr. Robert Sutherland, a Toronto physician and consultant in industrial and environmental health. However, the product is being kept off the market during this period. The government will release the report for publication as soon as it has been received.

When the Honourable André Ouellet announced this first phase of the federal program, he did not rule out the possibility of further government action. This is still under consideration.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

POST OFFICE—NEWSPAPER REPORT OF CHANGE TO UNILINGUAL SIGNS IN MONTREAL

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Molson on November 3, 1981, concerning a newspaper report that the Post Office in Montreal was changing some of its bilingual signs to unilingual signs.

I am informed by officials concerned with the Post Office and the Federal Program of Bilingualism that the post offices are within the Treasury Board's Federal Identity Program. As such, they are part of the Federal Bilingual Program, which takes precedence over provincial legislation with respect to federal buildings and property. Therefore, it is government policy that the signs on post offices be bilingual as part of the Federal Program of Bilingualism. It is the policy and belief of the officials concerned with the Post Office and the Federal Program of Bilingualism that the official signs of the Post Office in Montreal should and do remain bilingual.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF SUPERMARKET PRICE WAR

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to comments made and questions asked by Senator Marshall on November 3, 1981, concerning a supermarket price war. Senator Marshall asked, as reported at page 2945 of the Debates of the Senate, the following questions:

Is there an investigation taking place to determine how they [Steinberg's] can suddenly drop their prices by 20 per cent? And how can we get that price war spread down to Newfoundland, where the people are paying exorbitant prices?

I am informed by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the Director of Investigation and Research is aware of this matter. The Director of Investigation and Research has a statutory obligation under the Combines Investigation Act to commence an inquiry whenever he has reason to believe that an offence under Part V of the act has been, or is about to be, committed, or grounds exist for the making of an order by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission under Part IV.

It is the understanding of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the current supermarket price war was initiated in southern Ontario by Steinberg primarily because its share of business in this market has been decreasing. In reaction to this move, Steinberg's principal competitors in Ontario, Loblaws and Dominion Stores, have initiated substantial price cuts of their own. At present, the facts of the matter do not suggest predatory intent, nor is there any evidence of anti-competitive behaviour. Rather, the response of Steinberg's competitors is indicative of the existence of healthy competition in the market which, in the short term, should provide some benefit to consumers.

It is the understanding of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that the 20 per cent discount mentioned by Senator Marshall applies to the regular price of selected staple items, and is not applicable to all items. That would make the net reduction in the average grocery bill considerably below this level.

Douglas Tigert, a well-known retail food analyst, recently stated that his monthly survey of 120 food items showed Steinberg's new prices to be actually 1 to 2 per cent below those of the October 1981 average. The explanation for this is that widespread discounting has already reduced many prices from regular levels. Also, in announcing the substantial price reductions, Steinberg stated that such would be accompanied by cost-reducing measures, and mentioned specifically elimination of full-colour advertising flyers and the introduction of more self-bag check-out counters.

In reply to Senator Marshall's comment about having the price war spread to Newfoundland, I am informed that the Combines Investigation Act does not provide the director with any authority to so regulate a firm or industry.

Notwithstanding the current assessment of this matter by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the department has indicated that it will continue to monitor the situation closely.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for that answer, but it does not satisfy the situation. If they are trying to get more business in southern Ontario, then that makes them false right off the bat, because they are discriminating against other parts of Ontario.

The same Steinberg's have other stores called Valdi, or some such name, where you can buy cheaper in any case. So it is a matter of the same old story of their trying to monopolize the market. I am glad that the department is going to monitor the situation. I will keep monitoring the deputy leader.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I understand why Senator Marshall is not satisfied because, as he says—and I don't blame him—it would be nice if those kinds of price wars were more widespread. However, the answer was meant to deal with simply the Combines and Investigation Act, which concerns anti-competitive strategies rather than unsatisfactory situations in other ways.

Senator Marshall: I want to assure the deputy leader that I am not interested personally but for the people who cannot afford to buy a decent week's groceries with the income they have.

Senator Frith: Of course.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled: "They Served—We Care", tabled in the Senate on 20th October, 1981.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I adjourned this debate in order to be sure that no other senator wished to participate. Therefore, before requesting that the order stand, I will ask honourable senators to consider whether they wish to speak to it. If not, perhaps next week we can consider the subject debated.

Order stands.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

MEETING OF SUBCOMMITTEE RESPECTING WHEAT—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C. calling the attention of the Senate to the meeting of the Subcommittee of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group respecting wheat, held in Washington, D.C., U.S.A., on October 23rd and 24th, 1981.—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wanted to keep this order open for other senators wishing to speak to it, and I understand that perhaps Senator Argue, and certainly Senator Sparrow, will wish to do so. Therefore, I ask that it be allowed to stand in Senator Sparrow's name.

Order stands.

NEWFOUNDLAND

DEVELOPMENT OF HYDRO POWER AND OFFSHORE OIL RESOURCES—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Cook calling the attention of the Senate to certain matters relating to the development of hydro power in Labrador, and to the development of offshore oil resources of Newfoundland.—(Honourable Senator Marshall.)

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, I agree with Senator Marshall that this inquiry should now be considered debated. However, I should like to take this opportunity to say how pleased I am that the government has agreed to take a big step toward solving the problem of the still undeveloped hydro power in Labrador. The proposed legislation which will provide a corridor for the transmission and possible export of the now undeveloped power of Labrador is, of course, most welcome to my province. It is a matter I have spoken to in the Senate on numerous occasions.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect to the offshore oil resources portion, I think that, as long as negotiations are taking place for administrative arrangements, all parties agree that that is a desirable result for both Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

Senator Flynn: And Labrador.

Senator Frith: But I did want to state what I consider to be the legal aspect of the federal government's position on off-shore oil resources as it applied to Newfoundland, as I had done that with respect to Nova Scotia. Since this is an inquiry it can be withdrawn or considered debated, and if something justifies its being raised again, then I understand we can always raise it. In the meantime, we are all happy that negotiations are going forward on this aspect of the inquiry, and about the good news celebrated by Senator Cook on the hydro aspect.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to speak to this inquiry, it is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 10, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, tomorrow, November 11, veterans of two major wars and the Korean conflict from across the country will again pay a special tribute to their fallen comrades. It is truly remarkable that after some 63 years veterans of World War I, despite their disability and age, gather together at every memorial that exists, to show respect for their comrades who fell by their sides so many years ago. It is truly significant and admirable because, while thousands want to forget, that comradeship endures because of their suffering together in time of war to ensure the peace of our nation.

Unfortunately, as our veterans and their wives grow older they require more care and attention, and even though the recognition of their sacrifices diminishes in the eyes of too many, it is the duty of the government and we who represent them to live up to and honour Canada's commitment to the veterans of Canada, their wives and dependants.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I say on behalf of the supporters of the government that we join with Senator Marshall in the eloquent tribute paid to the veterans of Canada and those who died for Canada in her past wars. Increasingly, there is a national concern that new generations of Canadians seem unaware of the degree of sacrifice remembered at the November 11 observances. All too often November 11 is assumed to be just another holiday in the year, where people can do anything but remember the veterans and those who died. As parliamentarians it is one of our responsibilities to continue to remind coming generations, new generations, what that sacrifice has meant in the evolution of this nation and for the benefit of the entire world. I should like to thank the Honourable Senator Marshall for his eloquent words this afternoon.

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

RECOGNITION OF FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN HELSINKI MONITORING GROUP—MOTION REQUESTING RELEASE OF IMPRISONED MEMBERS

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, with leave, I should like to submit a resolution to be adopted by the Senate. November 9 marked the fifth anniversary of the founding of the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords. I shall later distribute among all honourable senators copies of an illustrated booklet on the objectives, activities and the fate of the members of that group.

Just as we have come to the defence of human rights activists in the Soviet Union several times in recent years, and with some effect, I am now proposing a resolution to defend the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group, which has virtually been forcibly destroyed by the Soviet government. I have discussed this matter with several honourable senators from both sides of the chamber, including the leaders, and all have indicated their wholehearted support.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Yuzyk: With leave, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, I move the following resolution:

WHEREAS on November 9, 1976, the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords (known also as the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group) was established in Kiev, the capital of Ukraine, to monitor the provisions of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, signed by the Soviet Union and 34 other countries, including Canada and the United States;

AND WHEREAS it was well-documented at the Belgrade and Madrid Review Conferences that the Soviet Union has violated and continues to flagrantly violate the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act, as well as the Soviet Constitution, the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

AND WHEREAS the Soviet Union has persecuted, imprisoned or exiled all 37 members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group, thus increasing the tensions between the East and West and undermining the validity of the international treaties and agreements of the Soviet Union;

● (1410)

BE IT RESOLVED that on the fifth anniversary of the founding of the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords, the Senate of Canada pay tribute to the Group's persecuted members and request that the Soviet Union immediately release all the imprisoned members of this Group and cease the persecution of all those who are active in the defence of human rights in compliance with the Helsinki Final Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, seconded by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C.: Whereas on—

Hon. Senators: Disperse.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Yuzyk: Honourable senators, please accept my profound thanks for your unanimous support. I would have liked to have included national rights as well, but the Secretary of State for External Affairs considered that at this time it would not be in the best interests of diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R. Even as it stands, this resolution will, I believe, give comfort and strength to the courageous human rights activists in Ukraine and the Soviet Union with the hope that freedom and democracy will ultimately prevail.

Motion agreed to.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN SENATE GALLERY OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place on Thursday next, November 12, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner, senators will not be excluded from the gallery on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and that this practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report by the Tariff Board, pursuant to the Inquiry ordered by the Minister of Finance respecting the petition for safeguard action by Interprovincial Steel and Pipe Corporation Ltd., Safeguard Petition No. 4, Reference No. 158, pursuant to section 6 of the Tariff Board Act, Chapter T-1, R.S.C., 1970.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Adams be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Molgat on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until next Tuesday, November 17, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as a post-scriptum, I would like to add that next week we intend to have a normal session, that is, we shall sit Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock, Wednesday and Thursday afternoon at 2 o'clock, but we shall not sit on Friday or next Monday.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No comment.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address one or two questions to the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting the communiqué issued on November 5 last by the Prime Minister of Canada, and signed by nine of the ten provincial premiers.

My first question has to do with the amending formula referred to in that document, which reads as follows:

(2) Amending Formula:

—Acceptance of the April Accord Amending Formula with the deletion of Section 3 which provides for fiscal compensation to a province which opts out of a constitutional amendment.

My question is: Which one of the provinces was it that requested that this item of fiscal compensation be dropped from the April Accord?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

Senator Roblin: I wonder if my honourable friend would be good enough, when he is looking into this matter, to determine whether it was one province that was, or more than one province that were, inclined to this; and if not any of the provinces, then who did request it?

Perhaps I may continue on the same subject, the communiqué of November 5. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could explain to me the exact implications of item (3)(c), which has to do with minority language education rights. It says:

(c) We have agreed—

That presumably means the Prime Minister and the nine premiers.

(c) We have agreed that the provisions of Section 23 in respect of Minority Language Education Rights will apply to our provinces.

This implies to me that the nine premiers are agreeable to having it apply to their provinces. What is the position of the Government of Canada with respect to the tenth province, which has not given any undertaking in this respect?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will commit myself to making a statement on that at the earliest opportunity.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend also mind finding out for me whether the nine provinces who signed this accord had anything to say about the conditionality regarding their acceptance of the minority language education rights? In other words, are they accepting it as an obligation on their part, regardless of what happens in the tenth province of the country; and, if that is the case, what is the attitude of the federal government? Are the federal authorities going to be satisfied with that as well, or will they wish to have the same clause mandatory in the province of Quebec?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this is an important question. I will take the question as notice and bring more information regarding the constitutional talks to the Senate at the first opportunity.

I do have some information on constitutional matters here that perhaps I can share with honourable senators.

There has been a report that Quebec intends to spread its interpretation of constitutional developments in French-speaking countries.

The news out of Quebec is contradictory. The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs has denied the accuracy of reports to the effect that the Quebec government would attempt to stir up opinion in the francophone world on Canadian constitutional developments. On the other hand, Premier Lévesque, in his inaugural message of November 9, said that the Quebec authorities would be transmitting its message to "all those who across the world listen to us with the slightest sympathy".

It would, of course, be quite improper for any province to try to bring about this result. Our posts abroad are well informed of developments in Canada and are in a position to correct any distortions which may be propagated.

In any event, the federal government has indicated its willingness to discuss matters further with Quebec in order that there can be a resolution acceptable to all governments.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You should have done it before.

Senator Perrault: It must be said, with a degree of disappointment, that so far the Premier of Quebec has not made any move whatever to communicate with the Government of

[Senator Roblin.]

Canada regarding the invitation to meet to discuss outstanding differences of opinion with respect to the constitutional package. I have been advised that there have been no communications of any kind—no messages, no telephone calls.

• (1420)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I asked last night what form the invitation to resume negotiations by the federal government to the Government of Quebec took.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have made an inquiry on that point. It was a general invitation. No formal letter was dispatched to the Government of Quebec.

Senator Roblin: Via television?

Senator Perrault: There may have been another form of communication.

Senator Roblin: Radio?

Senator Perrault: I have checked and have ascertained that there was no form of correspondence.

Senator Flynn: This is very important because the fact that the Government of Quebec has not replied may mean that Premier Lévesque did not receive a formal invitation.

Senator Perrault: The interesting thing, however, is that the Premier of Quebec has certainly replied to the invitation very publicly through television, radio and other forms of the media such as magazines and newspapers.

Senator Flynn: You are speaking through the radio.

Senator Roblin: This sounds like broad swords at 40 paces to me. Would the minister confirm that no official or formal invitation has been extended to the Government of Quebec in this matter? That is certainly the impression that has been left with me.

Regardless of what reaction may presently be discerned in governmental circles in the province of Quebec, I do not think it would be helpful for the federal government to refuse to avail itself of the opportunity of making a formal invitation in which it might indicate the areas of discussion. Surely that has to be a necessary and, I hope, a helpful first step in having some reconsideration of the general picture, not only in the mind of the Premier of Quebec, but in the minds of the people of that province, who are really much more important than he is.

Senator Perrault: I know the honourable senator's suggestion will be given careful consideration by the government.

Senator Roblin: That would surprise me.

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Dealing with the matter of the Constitution, a few weeks ago I posed a question to the Leader of the Government concerning the federal government's publicity campaign in Quebec aimed at selling the Charter of Rights or the constitutional package to that province. Am I mistaken in my view that this campaign seems to have stopped?

If I correctly understood what Mr. Lévesque said yesterday, he indicated that he intended to reply to this campaign by initiating one by the Government of Quebec. If the federal government has stopped this publicity campaign, is it the intention to resume?

After the Leader of the Government has replied to the first part of my question, perhaps the Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments would consent to look into the question of the authority under which such a campaign can be launched and money spent on something that has not yet been adopted by Parliament.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: Would Senator Godfrey reply to the second part of my question?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: As you will have noticed, I was deep in conversation with Senator Goldenberg who was reporting upon the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs when the question was asked, and I do not have the vaguest idea of what it was.

Senator Flynn: I will try to make myself understood, although it may be difficult.

Senator Godfrey: I did not hear what you said.

Senator Flynn: I questioned the Leader of the Government some time ago about the authority for the government to spend money on a publicity campaign concerning something that has not yet received approval by Parliament. At that time the Leader of the Government cited a certain vote.

Would the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments look into the question of whether the government has proper authority to spend that money under these circumstances?

Senator Godfrey: I am not sure whether that committee has the right to look into that type of matter, but I will certainly make inquiries.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State, Senator Austin, and it relates to the decision by the premiers and the Prime Minister last week to drop section 34 of the Joint Resolution. I recently visited Watson, and it came as no surprise to me that many people in that area are quite upset that aboriginal rights have been dropped from the constitutional resolution.

It has come to my attention that yesterday the Prime Minister held a meeting with members of the Inuit committee at which time a two-day interval was suggested in order to come up with a new proposal. Does the Minister of State have any further information on this situation?

● (1425)

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister and the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, John Munro, met with Charlie Watt and members of the Inuit committee on Monday at lunch to discuss this question of the dropping of section 34 of the Joint Resolution. I was invited to be present at the luncheon, but unfortunately my father, who lives in Edmonton, is ill and I was requested by my sister to be there.

The Inuit committee, headed by Charlie Watt and Peter Ittinaur, the member of Parliament from Numatsiaq, made representations to the Prime Minister asking him to reinstate section 34 under federal jurisdiction. The Prime Minister said that he would consider that matter, but he also discussed with the members of the committee the value to them of the procedure proposed under section 36, which concerns the first ministers' constitutional conference on aboriginal rights. A further meeting on all of these matters will be held this afternoon between the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, myself and the Inuit committee. I will endeavour to discuss the matter with Senator Adams, at least, following that meeting.

While I am on my feet, may I reply to the question on section 36 that was addressed to me by Senator Tremblay and Senator Roblin? I understand that officials of the federal government and the provincial governments are endeavouring to incorporate clause 5 of the November 5 agreement into a form of Joint Resolution. At this time there is no agreed text available for release. I am hopeful that such a text with respect to clause 5, which would become section 36 of the Joint Resolution, will be available shortly. In that case, of course, it will be included in Part III of the Joint Resolution, and, therefore, it will be included in the constitutional document.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Do you mean a clause that would only refer to the discussion of the question by a constitutional conference?

Senator Austin: Yes.

Senator Flynn: Only that?

Senator Austin: As Senator Flynn is aware, section 36 of the Joint Resolution proposed a constitutional conference on aboriginal rights. Clause 5 of the executive agreement of November 5 slightly amended section 36, and the final terms are being settled among officials. Assuming a settlement will be reached, I am instructed that it is proposed that there will be a section 36 in the Joint Resolution which will call for a first ministers' conference on aboriginal rights.

Senator Flynn: Only a conference?

Senator Austin: A conference to discuss aboriginal rights.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a supplementary question, if Senator Adams will permit me. The minister keeps talking about section 36. There are really three portions to that section. Subsection 36(1) talks about the annual constitutional conference on anything. The portion dealing with aboriginal rights is subsection 36(2), which states that aboriginal rights will be discussed at such a conference. Subsection 36(3) says the same thing with regard to the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Is my honourable friend really saying that section 36 will be abolished in toto and that only the parts with respect to aboriginal rights will be rewritten, or is he merely saying that section 36(2) will be abolished and the new part substituted for that?

Senator Austin: I regret that I am not able to satisfy Senator Roblin specifically. All I can say at this time is that discussions are ongoing between federal and provincial officials with respect to the text of section 36. As soon as a final text is available, I shall be pleased to refer it to Senator Roblin.

● (1430)

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend and will await that. He made another point I would seek clarification on. He said that if it comes back, if I understood him correctly, section 36 would be included in the items in section 3 of the executive agreement. My query is: Would it be included in section 3(b), which is the one that has the "notwithstanding" clause in it?

Senator Austin: Perhaps I was not clear enough. I was referring to Part III of the Joint Resolution itself, rather than any part of the executive agreement, which is dated November 5.

Senator Tremblay yesterday referred to Part III when referring to section 36. Section 36 is the only section in Part IV of the Joint Resolution.

Senator Roblin: That clarifies it.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: I have a supplementary question to ask the minister. It is my understanding from reading the press that a change in the status of aboriginal rights which was included in the original document, the Joint Resolution, came about as a result of pressure being applied by a number of provinces. Would the minister outline to us the reasons for the provinces taking such a stand that, in fact, forced the federal government's hand, and, if necessary, name those provinces? Secondly, if it was the provinces that created this situation, has any consideration been given by the federal authorities to honour the original commitment in those areas which are now territories and which, in fact, do not have provincial government?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I am not in a position to tell you what representations were made to the federal government by those seven provinces which insisted on the deletion of section 34. But, it is clear that all seven provinces—and I am excluding Ontario, New Brunswick, and as Senator Flynn said yesterday, Quebec—took the position, for whatever reason, that section 34 could not be included in any agreement acceptable to them.

To answer the second part of your question, the federal government is considering what options are available to it with respect to continuing on with its desire to ensure fair treatment of the aboriginal peoples.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Adams asked me a question about one ongoing procedure, which is a series of meetings with the Inuit people. The present stage is a series of consultations with representatives of the aboriginal peoples to see what their desires are. Following consultations which arise out of that, we will endeavour to make a decision.

Senator Buckwold: May I ask a supplementary question? I still have not received from the minister the reasons for the provincial government's actions. He may be able to outline them generally. It would seem to me that one of the options open to the federal government is to live up to the original commitment which was outlined in, I think, section 34 of the Resolution and that at least the native peoples would get half a loaf in those areas in which the federal government is supreme.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, on the question of the subjective nature of the position of the seven premiers, I can only go back to a judicial precedent that I learned as a young lawyer in which a famous Chief Justice of Great Britain, Chief Justice Hawke, said, when asked to speculate about the subjective, "The devil himself knows not the mind of man."

As for the federal government's position, presumably I will be part of that mind, and I assure you that, as I said yesterday, I grieve for the loss of the possibility of aboriginal rights being established and hope that the federal government will be in a position to do whatever it can to ensure aboriginal rights, at least within the ambit of the federal power.

● (1435)

Hon. Martial Asselin: As a supplementary I wish to ask a very simple question. Can the minister say why the federal government has given up the rights of the aboriginal peoples which had been included in the documents considered by the committee and by both houses?

Senator Austin: Well, Senator Asselin, I think you well know that the federal government decided that the balance of the constitutional arrangement as proposed by nine of the provinces was a substantial advance for the right of Canadians and a substantial advance on constitutional maturity in Canada. But I cannot give an answer to this question—

Senator Asselin: I know.

Senator Austin:—and its implied premise, without saying that the party to which the senator belongs insisted all along that there be no constitutional revisions of rights without the consent of the provinces. Therefore, anything we could do was limited—and is now limited just as the Progressive Conservative Party wanted—by the position of the provinces.

Senator Asselin: Can the minister tell the house whether the federal government negotiated these rights away in return for some other rights?

Senator Austin: I think the agreement must speak for itself. What the exchanges were, you will read about, supposedly, in an historical text.

Senator Asselin: You cannot answer, eh?

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary question. Senator Buckwold said that in the area of aboriginal rights the federal government, in Parliament, is supreme. Therefore, it seems to me, Parliament could very well amend the Constitution in this area in which the federal government is supreme without having the consent of the provinces, and that, in fact, Westminster would be acting ultra vires by deciding something about which it has already released its authority. Perhaps Senator Austin would like to comment on that.

Senator Austin: I take it that the Leader of the Opposition is speaking from his experience as a former Minister of Justice in offering us that legal opinion.

Senator Flynn: It was not experience enough.

Senator Austin: Well, was it long enough to have that statement as a legal opinion, or is the Leader of the Opposition telling us that his party would support the imposition by the federal government of aboriginal rights, should it have the constitutional power to do so?

Senator Flynn: It has the power to do so, sure. We could not oppose them on the principle of provincial interests.

Senator Austin: What would the Leader of the Opposition say, if the power were legal but not conventional?

Senator Flynn: You are entirely mistaken. The matter of convention does not enter into this, if it is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal Parliament, and government, as indicated by Senator Buckwold, who said that the federal Parliament is supreme in this area.

Senator Austin: Well, I am sure that on this question, as on many others, lawyers will be consulted and advice taken.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: As a supplementary question, did I understand Senator Austin correctly, to say that the agreement should be read as it is?

Hon. G. I. Smith: That is what he said.

Senator Tremblay: Does he mean in its written form or as it is otherwise?

Senator Austin: Senator Tremblay, I was using a phrase which lawyers customarily use to get out of trouble; that is to say that the document should be taken as read, which means you understand it as you read it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It speaks for itself.

Senator Austin: It speaks for itself, yes. Thank you, Senator Frith.

You know, in western Canada we speak English a little differently from the way it is spoken in Ontario.

I am not sure that Senator Tremblay was in the house when I answered the question that he asked yesterday.

• (1440)

Senator Tremblay: Is it correct that section 28 of the Resolution before us, referring to the equality of women, is not specifically mentioned in the written agreement?

Senator Austin: Well, I suppose that it is as obvious to Senator Tremblay as it is to anyone else.

Senator Tremblay: Is it in the written agreement, or not?

An Hon. Senator: Can't you read it?

Senator Tremblay: My reading of it is that it is not. Am I reading it correctly? Therefore, as a supplementary question, is it correct as well that there have been certain things agreed to, one way or the other, which are not in the written agreement?

Senator Austin: Senator Tremblay will appreciate why I answered the question he asked me yesterday in the way I did. I have not been given the official text of the federal-provincial agreement. Principles were established in the document of November 5 but it was left, as is usual, to officials of the federal government and the provinces to come up with a text which would be the final version of the agreement. The final version, in draft form, of a Joint Resolution is not yet available and, therefore, I could not offer Senator Tremblay a clear answer yesterday, and, until that document is available, I cannot answer Senator Tremblay today on the question he is pursuing.

Senator Tremblay: Speaking of the official text of the agreement—the written agreement—can I consider as official the document I received with the compliments of the Canadian Unity Information Office?

Senator Austin: Senator Tremblay is referring to the agreement of November 5—

Senator Tremblay: No; the agreement of last week.

Senator Austin:—which was tabled by Senator Perrault in this chamber. That is an official document. Senator Tremblay has been a senior official of a provincial government in his past career, and a very successful and admirable official, and he well knows that heads of principle have to be detailed by the work of officials, and that is the process that is now ongoing.

Senator Tremblay: But I think that Senator Austin, having been an official as well, would understand the meaning of my question. The meaning of my question is this: How many items of agreement will be implemented in the new resolution, which has not yet been signed, because that agreement has been signed? If we have to take it as it is, then the question can be raised: In the next version of the Resolution, shall we see only the things which have been signed, and shall we not see things which have not been signed, and shall we see other things that have not been signed also? That is quite important. As former officials, I think we can understand each other, and I would like to have an answer to that question.

Senator Austin: The best answer I can make to Senator Tremblay—and I think it is a good one—is that officials, guided by the ten first ministers who have signed this document, will put together an implementing document, and it, being approved by the ten first ministers, will express their intention as engrossed in the agreement of November 5.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, further to the question raised, is it the intention that the Resolution that will eventually be presented, seeking an agreement on an Address to Her Majesty, will bear the signatures of approval of the ten first ministers? I think that is what we are all asking. We have their signatures on what has been given various names—the declaration of principles, and so on—but will the actual resolution be submitted, as such, to all ten first ministers and be approved by them? If not, what is the sense of having an agreement and then coming later with a paper alleging that it is the agreement?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, a Joint Resolution before this chamber and the other place is, of course, the responsibility of the government alone. But I think it is fair to say that the government has entered into an understanding with nine provinces, and if the understanding remains intact, when it proceeds there will be public notice of the concurrence of those nine provinces.

Senator Grosart: What I am asking is: Is it the intention of the government to say, "Yes, the other nine first ministers have agreed to this form of address we are proposing"? Surely, the answer has to be "yes," or we have a document that has no necessary relationship to the agreement made.

Senator Austin: I am absolutely certain that when this Joint Resolution is introduced in both houses it will be done with a statement by the Prime Minister, or the minister responsible, that there is concurrence, and by which provinces.

Senator Grosart: "... and by which provinces"—that is very interesting.

May I ask a further supplementary of the Leader of the Government? Is it the intention, then, to withdraw the motion that he made on April 15, which appears on today's Order Paper at page iii—

That an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

—because I believe that is a short form of the motion which did include the resolution which is no longer under consideration? Is it the intention to withdraw that motion?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that, of course, is a distinct possibility. Negotiations are now taking place involving the leadership in the other place; and, hopefully, we will be having similar conversations here very shortly to determine the best way to proceed. It is a distinct possibility that the previous motion will be withdrawn.

Senator Grosart: What I am really asking is: Does it make any sense to carry on the Order Paper a reference to a resolution that is non-existent?

Senator Frith: It is not on the Order Paper.

Senator Perrault: The situation will be clarified in due time. I am not aware of the fact that it is on the Order Paper before us.

Senator Frith: No. According to the Senate order, it has to come back after the leader rises in his place and names the two days, after consulting with the Leader of the Opposition. It is not on our daily order paper.

Senator Grosart: Please, Senator Frith, let's not quibble. It is on the Order Paper. Of course, it is on Order Paper. It is not on the orders for today, but surely the Deputy Leader of the Government is aware that the Order Paper does not refer only to today. It says clearly on the Order Paper:

For a day to be named by the Leader of the Government in the Senate pursuant to the Order adopted by the Senate on 15th April 1981.

Of course it is on the Order Paper.

Senator Frith: I am talking about the question of whether there is any sense in having it appear. It is on the Order Paper, awaiting the implementation or triggering of the order of the Senate dealing with it.

Senator Grosart: It is on the Order Paper, which is not what you said previously.

Senator Perrault: It is not a matter that should be regarded as an emergency situation. As I have said, conversations are taking place and we should know very shortly what agreement has been achieved involving the house leaders.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, the Government of Canada and the premiers of the provinces have succeeded in something that has no relationship to what has happened to the Indians in the past. They have dropped, possibly, the life stream of the Indian people by not agreeing with what was referred to as aboriginal rights. In the B.N.A. Act there is only one word that refers to the first citizens of this land, and that is the word "Indians". There is no reference to treaty, non-treaty or status Indians. The provinces are now disagreeing with that, and have succeeded in reaching an agreement. My question is: Is it the purpose of the federal government, together with the provinces, to eliminate the word "Indians" in the B.N.A. Act, when it is patriated, and to replace it with the word "aboriginal"? The word "aboriginal" is not understood by many of our older people, and many of them have told me that it will upset their understanding of their status. Therefore, is the government going to eliminate the word "Indians" and replace it with the word "aboriginal"? There is no reference to treaty Indians in the B.N.A. Act; only the word "Indians" is mentioned. If that word is replaced by the word "aboriginal" there will be difficulties. Indeed, difficulties already exist.

● (1450)

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I appreciate the point made by the honourable senator. It is one that should be carefully looked into. There is certainly no intention at the moment of amending that provision of the B.N.A. Act. The honourable senator is correct in pointing out that the new phraseology is "aboriginal peoples of Canada". However, I will pursue the matter and will discuss it with the honourable senator.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, while my honourable friend is looking into the matter, perhaps he will go into it a little further, because it seems to me that under section 91 of the B.N.A. Act the subject matter of Indians, as Senator Williams has stated, comes under the purview of the federal government. Item 24 of section 91 says:

Indians and Lands reserved for the Indians.

I believe that has been generally interpreted, in the course of our history, to include the whole subject matter that we are discussing here today. It seems to me that, if that is the case, there is really nothing to prevent the Government of Canada's reinstating aboriginal rights in any way it wishes, either in this document or by separate legislation.

Under section 91.1, as my honourable friend opposite knows very well, the government has the power to amend those aspects of the Constitution that are within its present jurisdiction. It would therefore seem to me quite logical to suggest to my honourable friend the minister that if he is so aggrieved—and I believe him—in connection with what has happened in respect of this Indian matter, he should look into the possibility of giving some assurance that the Government of Canada will act under its own authority and power, as provided for under section 91.1, to deal with the subject matter of Indians, which is included in item 24 to which I referred, in order to reinstate in the legislation of the country the particular matters that we are discussing here today.

In that case, there is nothing to prevent the Government of Canada from enshrining it, if it wishes. In view of the fact that it is in its portion of the Constitution, as I understand it, there is nothing to prevent it from doing so. There would appear to be a happy and readily available solution to the question, and I should like to know what my honourable friend thinks about it.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn put that identical question to me earlier in Question Period. I would reply by saying that there are really two questions involved: What are the constitutional and legal rights of the federal government with respect to the matter raised by Senator Williams? And, secondly: Once the government knows what its rights are, what should it do as a matter of policy? Both questions are under review.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

REQUESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF INDUSTRIAL LABOUR AND MARKET INSTITUTE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Has the government received either a request or a recommendation that an organization known as the Industrial Labour and Market Institute be established with the participation of government, labour and business; if so, what is the status of that request or recommendation today?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice and will provide an answer at the next sitting of the Senate, if I have received the information by that time.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman. Perhaps the minister will pursue the matter a little further when making his research, and ascertain whether the allegation of an officer of the CLC is true to the effect that the government has been carrying on a cold war with the private sector, disregarding advice from both business and labour in this respect and others?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, on the face of it I would say the allegation is incorrect, because the government does not carry on a cold war with any Canadian citizen. However, I will look into that matter also.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): There is one in Alberta.

THE CONSTITUTION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to Senator Austin. Considering the fact that he referred just now to a procedure for obtaining confirmation of the agreement signed when the draft, in its final version as a resolution, is tabled, and considering the manner in which Manitoba signed the November 5 agreement—in the document in question, Manitoba's signature is accompanied by the following reservation:

Subject to approval of section 3(c) by the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba.

Section 3(c) is the section that refers to Section 23 of the resolution, that is, language of instruction.

Am I to infer from what Senator Austin just said that, in some as yet unspecified way, the provinces that signed will indicate their agreement with the resolution as presented? Am I to infer then that as far as Manitoba is concerned, the Legislative Assembly will have to give its approval, at least on Section 23? If the answer to my question is yes, would this right be extended to other provinces, that is, that legislative assemblies be involved in the final agreement process?

[English]

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I would like to consult with the appropriate minister in order to provide a correct answer to the question.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government.

Earlier, in reply to a question asked by my colleague, Senator Roblin, the Leader of the Government said that the federal government had invited Quebec to reopen negotiations. I also understood from his reply that no official invitation had been sent to Quebec; we do not know how it was done, whether it was on the radio or on television, but in any case, there is an informal invitation from the federal government to reopen negotiations. If this is true, could the minister tell us who the federal negotiator is at the present time? From time to time we see the Honourable Jean Chrétien come out of the Cabinet to make a statement. Two minutes later we hear the dashing Minister of State, Serge Joyal, state he is also responsible for making statements with respect to Quebec.

Could the minister tell us who, Mr. Joyal or Mr. Chrétien, is the official negotiator for the government, or have they both received a mandate to negotiate?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the opposition appears to be obsessed with determining in what form the invitation to negotiate with the Government of Canada was extended to the Government of Quebec. Certainly, there appears to be no mystery in the mind of Premier Lévesque of the Province Quebec. He has received the message or the signal very well. And he has replied by saying, "We won't have anything further to do with you; we won't negotiate; we won't sit down; we won't reason; we won't do anything which would make one assume that an agreement can be achieved." Is it fair to assume that perhaps he has never been very interested in achieving any agreement with the Government of Canada?

● (1500)

But, again, let it be made perfectly clear that the Premier of Quebec is aware of the willingness of the Government of Canada to sit down and negotiate the constitutional concerns which appear to be in the mind of the Premier of Quebec.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): From a position of strength.

Senator Perrault: Whatever the form of the communication, the message was received by the Government of Quebec, and a reply has been received. If the Premier of Quebec has indicated that he is not interested in negotiating, then why discuss those who will negotiate.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: The Leader of the Government did not answer the whole question. My question also included the following: Who, Mr. Joyal or Mr. Chrétien, is the negotiator when we refer to reopening negotiations with Quebec? Have they both been appointed by cabinet to negotiate with Quebec, or will Mr. Chrétien alone conduct these negotiations, accompanied by Mr. Joyal?

Hon. Louis Robichaud: The whole cabinet!

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as soon as Premier Lévesque replies in a positive manner to the invitation of the Government of Canada to negotiate, we will be pleased to announce who will participate in those vital negotiations.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: If I understood correctly the answer given by the Leader of the Government, neither Mr. Chrétien nor Mr. Joyal has been appointed as the official spokesman for the federal government with respect to reopening negotiations.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Both of them are competent!

[Senator Asselin.]

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this is a rather unreal dialogue. A hypothetical question is being asked and a hypothetical answer requested. I do not think the process advances the cause of a constructive Question Period.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government. As I understand him, the Leader of the Government continues to say that he does not know what kind of an invitation was extended by the Government of Canada to the Government of Quebec with respect to this matter, except that this public statement was made and published by various news media. What I would like to know is whether any other invitation was ever extended to the Premier of the Government of Quebec to engage in negotiations on the subject matter we have just been discussing.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this line of questioning is intriguing, to say the least. Is the opposition attempting to claim that Mr. Lévesque has not been made aware of the desire of the Government of Canada to negotiate certain constitutional differences. The invitation has been in every newspaper and on every radio and television station in Canada. Mr. Lévesque, indeed, has said that he knows that the federal government wants to sit down and negotiate, and he has replied to the Government of Canada. Senator Smith seems obsessed with an effort to determine whether, in fact, Mr. Lévesque knows about the invitation. There are many on the other side who have good connections with the Parti Québécois.

In fact, a member of the other place, Mr. Roch LaSalle, is reported to have met recently with Parti Québécois officials to discuss some sort of political co-operation in the next election. Perhaps he would like to convey the message to Mr. Lévesque.

Senator Smith: You are wandering, as usual.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps Senator Tremblay, who knows the ministry of the Government of Quebec very well, could get on the telephone and assure them that the Government of Canada wishes to enter into discussions.

Senator Tremblay: Are you giving me a mandate to negotiate?

Senator Smith: The honourable gentleman knows as well as anyone else—as he is accustomed to saying in answers to questions—that the road to negotiation is not through the newspapers or on the television; that the road to negotiation takes the form of a polite request from one head of government to another, or from one government to another, in an accepted way. I am not obsessed, and I am sure that my colleagues are not obsessed, with anything except finding out the truth, and if the honourable gentleman will tell us the truth we will be satisfied.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Smith specializes not so much in questions but in lectures, and we have heard enough lecturing on this point from him this afternoon.

Senator Smith: The honourable gentleman specializes in telling us what we should and should not do. We will take no more nonsense like that from him, and we will continue to ask questions as long as His Honour the Speaker does not rule us out of order. We have repeatedly asked the question, but the minister has endeavoured to avoid it, not by saying he does not want to answer it but by a lot of evasive and prolix statements which, when analyzed, do not mean anything, except that he does not want to answer the question.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is fair enough, because you sure don't.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if Senator Smith is prepared to convey a hand-written invitation to the Government of Quebec and deliver it personally, perhaps we can make the necessary arrangements. There is no mystery about the desire of the Government of Canada to meet with the Government of Quebec in order to achieve an accommodation.

Senator Asselin: Who is going to negotiate, Chrétien or Joyal?

Senator Perrault: For this opposition obfuscation to continue at this length is beyond any comprehension.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, the minister has long since ceased to believe in credibility and has not displayed any for so long, I cannot remember it, so I do not know why we should pay much attention to his views about credibility today. We merely want to know one thing, and that is the truth. Has such an invitation as the honourable gentleman has referred to been delivered on behalf of the Government of Canada to the Leader of the Government of Quebec? That is the question which has been asked time after time and which has not yet been answered.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Can the minister confirm or deny statements coming from Congressional hearings in Washington on the Alaska Highway natural gas pipeline to the effect that that project is no longer feasible financially, as the estimated costs are said to have risen from $30 billion to $60 billion?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the question before the Congressional committee deals with asking Congress to accept a waiver which changes some of the rules which were set down some time ago. I will have the documentation officially later today, but I have heard unofficially that the Senate Energy Committee has returned the resolution to the floor of the Senate by a vote of 15 in favour and one against.

THE ECONOMY

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BONDS—EVALUATION OF PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised on October 15 by Senator Bosa which concerned the Small Business Development Bond Program.

The Small Business Development Bond is a relatively new instrument recently developed by the government. Under the program, banks and other financial institutions may issue term loans of not more than five years or less than one year. Given this time-frame, it is probably too early to assess fully the impact of the bond.

It is important to note that loans provided under the SBDB program are generally extended in accordance with normal banking practices. That is to say, a bank or other financial institution which makes funds available through a Small Business Development Bond, applies its own normal lending criteria. This is in addition to the very minimal conditions which the government has established for a debt obligation to qualify as an SBDB. In other words, there is no reason to believe that a bank would provide funds through an SBDB or any other instrument without a reasonable expectation that these funds would be repaid. That is only good business.

It should also be noted that although the Small Business Development Bond has been used by small businesses mainly for expansion, the bond can indeed be used for re-financing purposes under certain conditions or to assist a small business in financial difficulty, as specifically defined in the Income Tax Act. Any losses are losses on the lender's own account, not the government's. The Small Business Development Bond simply aims at reducing the after-tax costs of interest for small businesses, and in this respect I suggest that it has been most successful. I am advised by my colleague, the Minister of State for Small Business and Tourism, that over $1.5 billion in loans have been extended under the program to date.

It is the intention of the government to follow closely the progress of this measure. The Minister of State for Small Business and Tourism or I will be happy to report to Parliament as more precise data become available.

MANITOBA

PROPOSED SITE FOR INSTITUTE OF AEROSPACE TRAINING AND TECHNOLOGY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Guay on November 3, 1981, at page 2946 of the Debates of the Senate concerning the proposed site for the Institute of Aerospace Training and Technology. Senator Guay asked the following question:

Can we be informed as to where this Institute of Aerospace Training and Technology will be established; whether it will be in Winnipeg, as was announced in the first place?

I am informed that the cabinet has not made any decision yet as to the establishment or location of an aerospace training centre.

As Senator Guay indicated, following release of the report recommending the establishment of an aerospace institute in Winnipeg, prepared for the Minister of Employment and Immigration by an advisory group made up of industry, unions and other private sector representatives, some opposition to the location was voiced by groups interested in seeing it established in Montreal.

The expanding aerospace industry is expected to require specialized training in view of the new technology being developed for the transportation and manufacturing sectors of the industry.

The problem of supplying skilled workers for the aerospace industry is one of national concern affecting all regions of the country, and in arriving at a solution to this problem the Department of Employment and Immigration indicates that it will try to meet the needs of all regions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is it correct that a lobby consisting of federal Liberal members of Parliament and federal Liberal members of the cabinet have taken a position in respect of the fact that it should go to Montreal?

Senator Frith: Not to my knowledge.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps my honourable friend would like to investigate the matter, because there have been some newspaper reports to that effect, saying that the francophone members of the cabinet from Quebec, and the members of the Quebec Liberal caucus, have been putting pressure on the government with respect to this matter, and wish it to be in Montreal.

I think it is rather important for those of us who have some interest in the matter to know what we are up against.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, as has already been mentioned, some opposition to the location was voiced by groups interested in seeing it established in Montreal. I hesitate to undertake to ask or deal with what takes place in caucus, or to find out the names of any of the people who are making representations to the effect that it ought to be established in Montreal. I am sure that there are many asking that it go to Montreal, and many hoping that it goes to Winnipeg; but I will not undertake to get information as to what the position of cabinet ministers in cabinet is on the question, or what the position is within caucus.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I understand that in caucus it is two to seventy-four.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think it goes without saying that there has been a pretty heavy lobby along the lines I have suggested; but if the minister is a little bashful about proposing names, he can propose my name as one of those who would like to see it established in Winnipeg.

My question now is: When will the minister be able to advise us as to the outcome of this matter?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with regard to the preamble to the question, it is not a matter of bashfulness but of principle, and of what I think is correct.

As to the question I am, of course, not in a position to answer that. I do not know that any cabinet minister is in a position to know, either; but I leave it to the cabinet ministers present as to whether they wish to make a prediction.

Senator Roblin: I wonder if I can ask the Minister of State for Economic Development, since he has been fingered so neatly, if he is prepared to make a prediction.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, many times, certainly in the life of this session, I have indicated the difficulty of trying to predict when someone is going to make up his mind. I think, however, there is a very serious matter of principle involved here. The honourable senators opposite ought at least to practise what they preach. They are now asking us to identify names, and so on. Two or three days ago, when Senator Murray came in here with stolen property, he would not even identify the source or the names. If you have any questions about who all these groups are, in fairness you should practise what you are asking us to do.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if that base goes to Montreal it is going to be stolen property indeed.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board) tabled:

Copies of letters from the Honourable Senator Argue, Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board), to the Honourable James Downey, the Honourable Gordon MacMurchy and the Honourable Hugh Planche, respecting the Port of Churchill, being a reply to Senator Guay's question of November 9, 1981 (English text).

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 17, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 17, 1981

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

HONOURABLE LEGH DAVIS, M.L.C., AND MRS. DAVIS OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we proceed I should like to call your attention to the presence in the gallery of the Honourable Legh Davis, M.L.C., and Mrs. Davis, of South Australia, who are making their first visit to Canada. On behalf of all honourable senators I wish Mr. and Mrs. Davis a pleasant stay in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with a change in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Budget papers, dated November 12, 1981, being Notices of Ways and Means Motions (1) to amend the Income Tax Act (1), (2) to amend the Income Tax Application Rules, 1971, (3) to amend the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, (4) to amend the Income Tax Act (2), (5) to amend the Excise Tax Act (1), (6) to amend the Excise Act (2), (7) to amend the Customs Tariff, together with supplementary information on the Budget; and related documents issued by the Minister of Finance, as follows:

"The Current Economic Situation and Prospects for the Canadian Economy in the Short and Medium Term";

"Fiscal Arrangements in the Eighties—Proposals of the Government of Canada";

"Analysis of Federal Tax Expenditures for Individuals"; and "Economic Development for Canada in the 1980s".

Report of the Committee on Wage Protection in matters of Bankruptcy and Insolvency, dated October 1981.

Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

NINTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the ninth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 3020.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration on Wednesday, November 25, 1981.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e) moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the supplementary estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have heard all day that the text of the resolution implementing the agreement concluded on November 5 of this year between the federal government and nine of the ten provinces is to be tabled by the government in the other place.

Am I to understand that the document is not ready, since the Leader of the Government has not tabled it and apparently it has not been tabled in the other place either?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have to report that the text is yet to be brought to its ultimate state of perfection. It is expected that tomorrow it may be possible to present that motion in the other place, and, of course, similar action would be taken as quickly as possible in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: I suggest that if it has to be brought here in a state of perfection, then we will not get it tomorrow, nor for some time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Perfection usually takes a day or two.

Senator Perrault: It takes Liberals only a day or two.

Senator Flynn: Probably the concept of perfection is not the same on the government side as on this side. I should like to know if one of the causes of the delay in reaching perfection is the intention of the government to study the exact proposals put forward today by the Quebec government and tabled in the National Assembly.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, every effort is being made to accommodate a number of alleged problems which have been brought to the attention of the government concerning the constitutional proposals. Some work is being done in that and other directions, and hopefully some action can be initiated in Parliament tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Flynn: When the government leader refers to matters other than Quebec's objections, is he referring to the status of women and the question of aboriginal rights?

Senator Perrault: I can say that many Canadians of all parties would like to see enshrined, in any constitutional package, the rights of women.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about you?

Senator Perrault: I am glad to say that efforts are being made in that direction. Senator Austin reported quite fully on the government's intentions with respect to native and aboriginal rights and the effort to achieve some sort of consensus with respect to that important matter.

Senator Flynn: Are we to understand that it is the responsibility of Senator Austin—the minister in charge of so many things that I cannot enumerate them at this time—to draft an amendment to the resolution respecting aboriginal rights?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): That is not my responsibility, honourable senators, but I hope I have a voice in the matter.

Senator Flynn: I am quite sure the minister's statement will be welcomed by the Indian people.

THE BUDGET

INCOME TAX ACT—RENTAL ACCOMMODATION—NON-DEDUCTIBILITY OF SOFT COSTS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I wish to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Would the minister enlighten the Senate—and through the Senate, the country—regarding the change of direction, which I understand was announced this afternoon in the other place, with respect to the budget proposal concerning the non-deductibility of soft costs for rental accommodation?

An Hon. Senator: He's never heard of it!

● (2010)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators may not understand this, except some of those who have been in the cabinet from time to time, but I was in a committee meeting from 3.30 to 7 o'clock this evening, and I will have to take notice of that question and bring the details later. Perhaps if such an announcement was made this afternoon, we can get the details before Question Period ends; but, in the event that I cannot get them that quickly, I will bring them tomorrow.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, by way of providing additional information, an adjustment has been made with respect to the effective date.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Flip flop!

Senator Perrault: The government has demonstrated consistently its capacity to change, alter and amend, in the public interest, where that public interest is clearly identified, and we make no excuses for that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of either the Leader of the Government in the Senate, or the Minister of State for Economic Development, who, of course, was at a committee meeting all afternoon, and therefore seeks to absolve himself of cabinet solidarity.

Oh, I see he now has a telegram from the Minister of Finance.

Senator Olson: Yes, I will read it to you now.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Well done!

Senator Olson: This is the text of the statement by the Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister dated today. It is as follows—

Hon. Martial Asselin: May we have a copy?

Senator Olson: It will take us about two minutes more to obtain copies, but that can be arranged too.

If you listen carefully you will get the gist of this, and then for the finer details I will undertake to see that you get a copy before this sitting ends.

The text is as follows:

I have received a number of representations from the building industry concerning the provisions in the budget relating to multiple-unit residential buildings (MURBs) and other commercial real estate projects currently under development.

Particular concern has been expressed with respect to the effective date of the proposal in paragraph 15 of the Income Tax Motion which deals with the deductibility of the so-called soft costs. I believe that the effective date of this change should be modified to overcome a number of difficulties that have been drawn to my attention. I will therefore propose in the implementing legislation that a deduction be provided for costs incurred after November 12, 1981 relating to any building provided that the installation of footings or any other base support of the building is commenced before the end of this year and that the construction of the building proceeds without undue delay.

The effect of this change will be that the measure proposed in paragraph 15 of the Ways and Means Motion will apply only with respect to those buildings where the installation of footings or other base support commences after 1981.

Senator Asselin: Once again you back up.

Senator Olson: I think that is a responsible answer to the problem, and the speed with which it was delivered is partly due to Senator Austin's diligence in having answers for senators when they ask for them.

Senator Flynn: Are you sure you understood what you read?

Senator Murray: The Minister of State for Economic Development is now applauding his own statement, honourable senators, or the statement of the Minister of Finance handed to him by his colleague, and I want to say, first of all, that it is a devastating commentary on the role of the Minister of State for Economic Development in this government that such a decision was taken and announced by his colleague the Minister of Finance in the other place without his even knowing of it.

Senator Olson: I disagree with your assertion. Besides, you are supposed to be asking questions; not making statements.

Senator Murray: Very well. We will test the knowledge of the minister in these matters. Let me ask the Minister of State for Economic Development when the other shoe is going to drop. In particular, will he inform the Senate whether the government is now considering—or, rather, whether the Minister of Finance is considering—swallowing the measure pertaining to deductibility of interest paid on loans for investment purposes. This is a proposal that is having a devastating effect, as he knows, on the stock market, and which tends to be counterproductive in view of the professed policy of the government of increasing the Canadian content of industry.

• (2015)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think several answers can be given to that question. First of all, it is not a question of the other shoe falling. If there had been representations made to the Minister of Finance—I should not say “if” because I know there have been some—

Senator Balfour: A simple yes or no!

Senator Olson: If those representations parallel what is outlined in the adjustments the Minister of Finance has made with regard to MURBs, for certain things that are already under way, it may be that he is going to make some changes. He has not, however, announced that at this point in time. My honourable friend knows very well what my attitude is towards making announcements for and on behalf of other ministers.

Senator Murray: I am interested to have that encouraging word from the Minister of State for Economic Development. Are we therefore to conclude that the budgetary policy placed before the other house—

Senator Balfour: It's a shambles!

Senator Murray: —and which the other house is being asked to approve in general, is simply a document for the purposes of negotiation?

Senator Olson: No, my honourable friend cannot make that assumption.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT—REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES

Hon. Lowell Murray: May I then ask the Minister of State for Economic Development why it is that the Minister of Finance announced that some $400 million less will be spent this year on economic development than had been projected in his 1980 budget?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That statement, too, is untrue.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): How do you know?

Senator Olson: I know because I know what the fiscal stance is.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): You simply have not read the budget.

Senator Murray: I put it to the honourable minister that in the 1980 budget document, the economic development envelope for 1981-82 was to have amounted to—

Hon. G. I. Smith: Four hundred million more.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Olson: I will bring you a statement.

Senator Murray: If the honourable minister wants to bring in a statement, he can do so, but I tell him that statistics indicate that the amount to be spent this year on economic development is some $400 million less than had been projected in the last budget. What concerns me is that last year when the Minister of State for Economic Development was being challenged to substantiate his claim that the economic development envelope had been increased by over 20 per cent, and we on this side claimed that virtually all of that increase could be accounted for by the Western Development Fund, the Minister of State for Economic Development told us that the Western Development Fund was not part of the money committed to the economic development envelope, but was, rather, apart from it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think I had better bring in a complete compilation of what was put in the budget last year, what was in fact spent, and what is projected for the fiscal year 1982-83. I think it would be helpful, because it would completely devastate the validity of the calculations made by the Honourable Senator Murray.

Senator Perrault: You will have to keep it in very simple form.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT RATE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the honourable senator responsible for the state of the economy—or, rather, the honourable minister of state responsible for the economy.

Over the past few weeks I have been asking the minister what plans the government has to deal with Canada's increasingly desperate unemployment problem. The last time I asked, I was given a little lecture and was told, in effect, that I should wait the three days necessary for the bringing down of the budget, that on budget day all things would be brought forth into light.

I wonder if the minister can tell me exactly what plans there are in the budget—because I have examined the document in some detail—to alleviate the problems of those hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have nothing to look forward to in terms of employment during the coming months. I am particularly concerned with how this issue relates to those people on the east coast who have been affected by the rather dramatic downturn in the fishing industry and who are really at desperate ends to try to make a living during the coming months.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there are a number of answers that can be given to that question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Again?

● (2020)

Senator Olson: One answer is that the main thrust of the budget, as my honourable friend knows, was to reduce the federal deficit, and to the extent that that influences the interest rate—and we believe that it can have a significant influence on the interest rate—we believe a very large number of economic development programs will go ahead as a result of a reduction in the interest rate. Therefore, there was no apology for that, because that is what needs to be done.

In addition to that, of course, there is funding provided through the Community Employment Program and through the Special Industry and Labour Adjustment Program. As I recall, some $500 million will be available to these programs in the field of job creation.

The reason I say there is more is that, of course, we have been concerned about the downturn in the marketability of some of the fish—and, consequently, of the whole fish catching and processing industry—that has occurred in the last three or four weeks, or perhaps a little longer. Informally, I was informed a little earlier today that there have been rather significant sales of frozen cod blocks out of storage, and that, indeed, the amount of inventory which has been overhanging the market is moving rapidly at the present time.

Hon. Jack Marshall: That's a lot of baloney. It's not fish; it's baloney.

Senator Doody: The Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate has just made the comment that this is a lot of baloney—

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I did not.

Senator Marshall: I did.

Senator Perrault: It was Senator Marshall who said that.

Senator Doody: Well, it was a red herring I think the honourable gentleman was dragging. He is probably more familiar with red herring than he is with baloney.

Senator Perrault: We are talking about selling cod blocks and you are dragging in red herrings.

Senator Doody: That's right. That's going to be very encouraging news to the thousands and thousands of fish plant workers who are out of jobs in the province of Newfoundland and on the east coast of Canada, the trawler fishermen and the inshore fishermen who have nothing to look forward to this winter but a smart-alecky remark to the effect that this is just another red herring. It is not a red herring. It is a really desperate situation. I have never seen things so economically down as they are today in that province, and I am very surprised at that comment, and a little discouraged.

Nevertheless, since we don't know all that much about the east coast, perhaps the honourable senator responsible for economic development can tell us what he intends to do now about the 18,000-plus layoffs that have been announced by central Canadian manufacturing industries. How does the honourable gentleman propose that the province deal with that particular problem? I am not referring to some time in the future, dealing with statistics and indicators. What are these people who are out of work to look forward to in the coming months?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in the preamble to his question the honourable senator attempted to attribute certain facetious remarks to members on this side of the house. I suggest he take that back and look at some of the members right around him and attribute the remarks to where they belong and where they originated.

An Hon. Senator: Newfoundland!

Senator Olson: That needs to be said, because that kind of comment is unfair. I know my honourable friend thinks he can make good use of the printed record of this house, but he really ought to get it straight.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: So far as the question is concerned, several actions are being taken. I announced some just a few minutes ago. In addition to them, it is our opinion that the main thrust of the budget, which has the purpose of lowering interest rates to the whole of the private sector, will in fact do as much as, and perhaps more than, any of the direct government programs in finding jobs in the numbers my honourable friend referred to.

Senator Doody: I have just one supplementary. Is the honourable minister telling us that the budget, or the so-called budget, has lowered interest rates? Is that what we are being told here this evening?

Senator Olson: We have been advised by honourable members opposite on a number of occasions that the way to lower interest rates is to pull the federal government out of the money markets to some extent by lowering the deficit and thereby lowering our requirements for cash in those markets. Honourable members opposite have been telling us for months that that in fact would have a significant influence on interest rates. So I do not think there can be much validity to the criticism by honourable senators opposite, when we have taken their advice.

● (2025)

Senator Flynn: You never take our advice.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister of state responsible for the poor state of the economy.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Shame!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What is shameful about that statement? It is true.

Senator Phillips: On Thursday, November 12, prior to the "dire straits" budget, the Canadian public was subjected to a propaganda blast of alleged achievements or imaginary improvements as a result of economic development in Canada. If there was one iota of truth in that advertisement—

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator is making a speech.

Senator Phillips: —which was placed by the Cabinet Committee on Economic Development, why did the Minister of Finance call for economic renewal in his budget?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to correct one thing, and that is that there was not one iota of untruth in that advertisement.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: The information contained in that advertisement was very carefully checked and it was all retrospective of the decisions which have been made by the Cabinet Committee on Economic Development during the past 18 months.

Hon. G. I. Smith: How much did it cost?

Senator Olson: There is no question about whether or not it is true; it is absolutely true.

Senator Smith: That is what you say.

Senator Olson: Well, I am the person who has the responsibility for checking out such matters—

Senator Smith: At last, we know.

Senator Olson: —for their accuracy.

Hon. Martial Asselin: For once, the honourable senator has a job.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It must have been a really good budget or they would not be so rancorous.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators opposite have distracted me and I have forgotten the second part of the honourable senator's question.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am not so sure that the honourable senator understood the second part of my question, but I will be happy to repeat it for him. Would he explain to the chamber why the Minister of Finance felt it necessary to call for economic renewal in Canada—

Senator Perrault: Are you against that?

Senator Phillips: —particularly in view of the fact that we have such a distinguished minister responsible for economic development?

Senator Olson: Now I understand the question. I would like to reply by informing my honourable friend, in case he has not noticed, that the economic development potential for Canada is greater now than it has ever been.

Hon. C. William Doody: Provided there is a change in government.

Senator Olson: It is part of the government's job to put together an economic strategy—

Hon. Jack Marshall: Shame!

Senator Olson:—based on a number of considerations, which include such things as: resolving the critical skills shortage, which the Minister of Employment and Immigration is working on; keeping abreast of high technology development, which the Minister of State for Science and Technology is working on; and responding through industrial adjustments to the enormous potential opportunities, which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is working on. It seems to me that while it may not be necessary for the honourable gentleman opposite, it is necessary for the Canadian public at large to see in one document evidence of the very close attention this government intends to give to correlating all those matters.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question, but before I direct it to the honourable Minister of State for Economic Development, may I thank him for explaining to the chamber, in a roundabout way, the fact that the Minister of Finance did not see the advertisement before he called for economic renewal. I have always appreciated the fact that the honourable minister could see both sides of a question.

An Hon. Senator: And explain both sides, too.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): More than that.

Senator Phillips: Yes, and he can explain both sides, too. I wonder if the honourable minister would consider running—

Senator Marshall:—as an M.P.

Senator Phillips:—running an ad—again at the taxpayers' expense—further elaborating on the achievements of this government. The advertisement could make mention of the fact that this government has achieved record high interest rates and record high levels of unemployment. It could also refer to the increase in foreclosures on mortgages and the increased number of bankruptcies in both farms and businesses. It might also explain the increased cost of living and numerous other things. In particular, would the minister consider referring to the fact that these alleged achievements were accomplished by a 43 per cent increase in tax revenues?

● (2030)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it would be very difficult for the government to run that kind of advertisement, because of its determination to print only the facts.

Senator Flynn: In that event, it would be a blank page.

Senator Perrault: It would be misrepresentation.

Senator Phillips: Since the honourable minister is having a difficult time distinguishing the truth this evening, would he consider applying my suggestion to the running of an advertisement concerning the budget? The advertisement would state that the budget forecasts continued high interest rates, continued unemployment and continued inflation. If the minister cannot agree with that, then he must claim that no facts are contained in the budget.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I understand the facetious nature of this kind of questioning but, if I may be serious for a moment—

[Senator Marshall.]

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: It's about time.

Senator Olson: The advertisement to which the honourable senator referred was run after some 218 decisions had been made by the Economic Development Committee.

Senator Asselin: Name them.

Senator Olson: I have always maintained the position that the people of this country have the right to know what government is doing, and that is in keeping with our action.

Senator Smith: At whose expense?

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, until I heard that answer from Senator Olson about the government being incapable of printing anything but the facts, I never knew that he could be so humorous, and I would like him to know that he is.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SYRIA—PROPOSED DIPLOMATIC MISSION IN DAMASCUS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, since I am a kindly, benevolent person, I am not going to ask a question on the budget. I am sure many of my friends will have further questions on that topic.

My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it concerns external affairs. It is prompted by the recent visit of His Majesty King Hussein of Jordan whose visit to this country, in my judgment, was not terribly well handled by the Department of External Affairs. Since I am one who loves to find something positive, I must say that I am very happy that the government has finally listened to my plea of the last five years that this country open a mission in Amman. I congratulate it on that.

However, since one good turn deserves another, is there any disposition to move towards the opening of a mission in Damascus in keeping with my other concurrent and consistent suggestion that this country cannot understand the Middle East without an entrée to all the states in that area? This would allow for an expansion of our foreign service. Since the second language in Damascus is French, it would be a fine opportunity for the wonderful people in the Department of External Affairs whose first language is French.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

THE BUDGET

EFFECT OF PROVISIONS ON WAGE-EARNERS

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct two or three questions to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is the Minister of Finance aware that he has missed his target with this budget, which was to soak the rich and help the poor? Is he aware that many thousands of workers across the country are interpreting this as a "get the workers" budget?

Is the Minister of Finance aware that, in the greater Vancouver area, as of six o'clock last night, the construction of 7,500 rental units was cancelled? This amounts to almost $1 billion worth of construction work. Is he aware also that about 2,000 workers were laid off?

An Hon. Senator: Massey-Ferguson.

Senator Lawson: I understand that the minister has had a momentary return to economic sanity and has made some adjustment to continue MURBs until the end of the year, and that that may have happened in time to save some of those projects. Is the Minister of Finance aware that it costs $1,000 to $1,200 a month to rent a two-bedroom apartment in the greater Vancouver area and that, if the program does not continue, people will be faced with rents as high as $1,500 to $1,600 a month?

Does the Minister of Finance understand the devastating effect that the proposed budget will have on forestry and construction workers who are forced to keep two homes in order to earn the kind of wealth which keeps this country going and that with tax benefits being cut off they will be unable to earn enough to pay high mortgages resulting from high interest rates? Is the minister further aware of the additional conflict which will be created as a result of this budget because workers will have to look to their employers for additional benefits, and that this will create further conflict?

When the minister said that the budget was aiming at those rich people who could afford to invest, did he realize that he was not only aiming at doctors, lawyers and accountants, but at truck drivers, electricians, plumbers, labourers and all kinds of ordinary Canadians who are also investing?

Finally, I wonder if the Minister of Finance is aware that, by cancelling the write-offs on the interest on investment unless the investment is in an established company with dividend returns, this is being interpreted in the west as a "get the west" budget.

An Hon. Senator: Of course it is.

Senator Lawson: Is the minister aware that the feeling is that the primary sufferers of the damage of this direction are westerners who will be forced to invest in established companies in the east and discouraged from investing in Alberta or British Columbia, where 90 per cent of the stock market is in junior resource companies that create new wealth and new jobs? Is the minister aware of the very serious damage and the irreparable harm that will be done to the country as a whole as a result of this budget?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot answer directly whether the Minister of Finance is aware of all the assertions made by Senator Lawson. However, I will see that he receives a copy of those assertions as soon as they are available.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Is he aware of the implications of his policy?

Senator Olson: I think it is fair to say, whether or not we accept the tone of those assertions, that the minister has received representations respecting MURBs, and he announced an adjustment earlier today.

THE ECONOMY

PROSPECT OF RECESSION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to pursue with the Minister of State for Economic Development the question of whether it is the diagnosis of the government that we are in, or are heading into, a serious economic recession in this country.

In October, Statistics Canada warned that:

Signs that a slowdown in economic activity will extend over the second half of 1981 proliferated in July as the Canadian Composite Leading Indicator fell for the second consecutive month, and the weakness that characterized several components in June broadened and intensified in July. In July, seven of the 10 components fell. Indicators of consumer spending declined and large losses in the residential-construction index underlined the depressed outlook for housing. Prospects for exports weakened further.

Six days before the budget, Statistics Canada said:

—market slowdown in activity could develop into a recession during the coming months. The sharp decline in indicators of economic activity has already led firms to cut production, and layoffs have become widespread.

I am sure that the minister will have taken note of the statement made by the respected investment house of Pitfield Mackay Ross Limited, as follows:

—Minister MacEachen's budget represents an economic blunder of heroic proportions; a fiscal and financial disaster . . . The economy is already well launched on what promises to be the worst Canadian recession since the 1930s. This is no time to flatten the economy and torpedo the capital market.

I would ask the minister whether it is the diagnosis of the Minister of Finance and the government that we are, in fact, in a serious recession or are heading into a serious recession and, if so, how he justifies the policies that were introduced by the Minister of Finance the other night.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it is no problem to justify the policies introduced the other day. Of course, it is perfectly normal for the opposition, in unison, to criticize the budget no matter what it contains.

● (2040)

It is not unusual for some investment houses and others who feel adversely affected by the budget to criticize it and, in some cases, to use some extreme language. I do not know whether it was that particular investment house or some other, but I know—

Hon. G. I. Smith: When are you going to answer the question?

Senator Olson: —that there was a general admonition, if that is the right word, by investment houses generally to the government prior to the introduction of the budget. One of the most difficult matters facing the economy was the high interest rates, and it follows from that that one of the causes of, if that is the right word, or one of those things contributing to, high interest rates was the size of the federal government's deficit. Therefore, the Minister of Finance took responsible action in lowering those cash requirements rather substantially.

Senator Smith: When are you going to answer the question?

Senator Olson: What is more, in the longer term, the government is of the view that it can probably give more medium- and long-term benefit to the economy of this country and, indeed, to people's job security by attacking the question directly, such as it has done in the budget.

Senator Murray: May I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development very simply whether Canada is in an economic recession?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is now really asking me to do his homework for him. He can read the minister's speech.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You are pushing it.

Senator Olson: All of those projections are outlined clearly in that speech, but if he does not have the time to read it and would like me to bring it to this house and read it to him directly, I can do that.

Senator Smith: Just answer the question.

Senator Flynn: Say yes or no.

Senator Murray: May I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development what the government's definition of a recession is?

Senator Olson: The Minister of Finance did not define that word. You can look it up in the dictionary.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Murray: Is that the government's policy—Webster's Dictionary?

Senator Olson: No, the government's policy, as I tried to say a few moments ago—and I am rather surprised that the honourable gentleman cannot get this through his head, but all he has to do is read the minister's speech. I know that he has probably done so more than once already, but if he does that he will see that the minister lays out carefully the projections that have been made by him as they relate to all the indicators he has identified.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if my honourable friend is serious about the suggestion that we should read the minister's speech, because if one tried to reconcile what the minister said in his speech—if you would just listen to the rest of my comments you would have something to make your comments on.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is it a question or a comment?

Senator Roblin: It is a question.

How does the minister reconcile the figures given by the Minister of Finance in his speech with the actual rate of unemployment in this country, the forecast on which his prognosis for the next few years is based? How does the minister reconcile the figure for inflation contained in the speech given by the Minister of Finance with the facts issued by Statistics Canada? How can the minister ask us to pay attention to that speech when the very economic forecasts on which it is based are related to figures which we know from experience, and from information given to us by Statistics Canada, are wrong? He has underestimated unemployment; he has underestimated the rate of inflation in this country; and he has done that in a document like a budget speech. Bearing that in mind, what possible credence could we give to his forecasts for the future, and how does my honourable friend reconcile those figures?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will stand and respect and defend my honourable friend's right to disagree with what is contained in the budget and what prognostications there are in it, but I can tell him emphatically that I would rather rely on what is contained in the budget speech and the projections contained therein than on the so-called off-the-cuff projections he has just made.

Senator Roblin: I did not make any off-the-cuff projections. I am not making any projections. My honourable friend knows that I am not making any projections.

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator Roblin: I am asking my honourable friend to deal with the facts, and the facts on unemployment and inflation are not an invention of mine. They were given to this country by Statistics Canada. The figures contained in the budget do not match those.

Senator Olson: I asked my honourable friend—

Senator Roblin: Just a minute. I intend to continue with what I have to say regardless of what other senators may suggest.

We hear this business about bringing down pressure on the public markets in respect of government financing and what the government is going to do about interest rates in that respect. How interesting! Would my honourable friend reconcile that point of view with the excuses he has been feeding us for God knows how long to the effect that interest rates are beyond the control of the Government of Canada? Has he been telling us that interest rates come from the effects of financial policy in the United States? Of course he has, and so have all the apologists on behalf of the government. Now they are saying, "Look at us. We are going to bring down the interest rates all by ourselves." Well, I hope that they can do it, but I suggest to my honourable friend that the pressure in the marketplace and the size of the government's borrowing program may have something to do with the Canada Savings Bond issue which we have recently heard about. What was the rate of interest applied to that? It was 19.5 per cent. What person in a responsible position in this country could have decided, in the conditions of the moment, that that 19.5 per cent was fair? Now we know why the cost of supporting the public debt is going the way it is.

I suggest to my honourable friend that he has already had his fingers in the cookie jar. We know he has already had his fingers into the financial capacity of this country by the tremendous amounts of money that were sucked into the government purse by means of that 19.5 per cent. Now he comes around and says, "Look, it is only going to be $6 billion and something for the rest of the current year."

You have had it, and you are going to get some more and you will find that your efforts to bring down interest rates will be a little more difficult than you expect.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what the honourable Senator Roblin has tried to do is make a great fuss about some diversionary things. Let us just go back to where he started for a minute. He says that the Minister of Finance's projections are wrong because, in his opinion, they do not square with his calculations from Statistics Canada. I just do not accept that. If he wants to come along with some well-thought-out projections based on Statistics Canada indicators at any given time, then let him do so, but he should not try to degrade the projections that were made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech of last Thursday evening.

Senator Smith: Why not?

Senator Olson: Because those were based on figures that were available at the time and, indeed, on what happened. I suggest that they are far more reliable. None of them are always reliable because the economy can change.

In the second part of his question he claims that I said that the interest rates in this country are beyond the control of the federal government. I have said over and over again that, as long as we want to be in an open market—if that is the right word—in trade, and particularly in the movement of capital, we are, to a large extent, dependent on what happens in the international market.

We have heard this kind of complaint over and over again from members on the opposite side. When you ask them what they want us to do about it, they never have the guts to tell us to impose international monetary exchange controls. No, they do not say that, but they want to blame the government, and I have said that, as long as we have this open economy, we will be subject to the influence of the international marketplace, but we as a country have to make a contribution.

Senator Smith: So we have high interest rates.

Senator Olson: The contribution we have announced in the budget is that we lower the federal government's deficit and reduce its requirement from the market to the extent that we have an influence on that market. We are prepared to do that because we think, over the long term, that that is the most effective action that can be taken.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I noticed that my honourable friend has scrupulously refrained from denying that the figures given by Statistics Canada paint an entirely different picture of the state of the economy of this nation than those given by the Minister of Finance.

Senator Olson: I deny your calculations as having no validity.

Senator Roblin: That is a simple thing to do because I have not made any calculations.

Senator Olson: You just told me that the Minister of Finance is wrong.

Senator Roblin: I simply stated that if you start on the wrong basis you will get the wrong answer. I suggested to my honourable friend that we are starting from the wrong basis because the figures in the budget speech are not the same as the figures supplied by Statistics Canada. He does not contradict that and probably agrees that they are different. If so, I certainly think it indicates that we may be operating on an entirely false assumption as to what the economic forecasts of this country are going to be. I say to my honourable friend that he will find, unless he has an opportunity to convert Governor Bouey of the Bank of Canada, that he will talk about interest rates in terms of the Canadian dollar, and that that is going to be related directly to what is going on in the United States. An argument that some of us have been making is that this regard for the value of the Canadian dollar and its effect on interest rates—which I believe is the fundamental case of the interest rate policy we have, namely, the policy of the Bank of Canada supported by the government—is the biggest single question we have to resolve, whether or not that system provides more advantages than disadvantages.

● (2050)

The Leader of the Government asks what the opposition is going to do. I do not know what the opposition is going to do, but I know some of the thoughts I have put forward in a committee of the Senate and in other places, which is that the policy of the Bank of Canada with respect to interest rates, whatever its justification might have been in the beginning, is certainly past the point of diminishing returns; and it seems to me that that is where you are going to have to do something if you are going to get anything done on interest rates.

Senator Olson: Is the honourable senator recommending that the minister of influence take a more direct hand in what the Bank of Canada is doing?

Senator Roblin: I don't know who the "minister of influence" is—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order! Would the Deputy Leader of the Opposition please try to confine himself to matters coming within the definition of Question Period?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in my 14 years in this chamber I have never heard of a "minister of influence." Who is he?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend asked me a question, and perhaps I owe him the courtesy of an answer. I agree with my honourable colleague in that I do not know who the "minister of influence" is.

Senator Olson: I said "take a more direct hand in".

Senator Roblin: The minister said "minister of influence". I do not know what my honourable friend thinks about it, but I know that the Statutes of Canada provide that the ultimate responsibility does rest with the government and not with the Governor of the Bank of Canada—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: —and that question has to be faced. If the government wishes to support the governor of the bank, that is a perfectly legitimate position for it to take; but regarding taking a stand, as I assume my honourable friend intended me to do, as to whether or not the government should exercise its discretion in dealing with the governor of the bank, I say it is the government constitutional responsibility to do so. If the government does not do anything about it, it can only be assumed that it approves of it.

An Hon. Senator: Answer the question.

Senator Roblin: I have answered the question he was silly enough to ask me.

THE SENATE

DIFFICULTY IN OBTAINING INFORMATION FROM GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, apart from the fact that we are unable to get any answers here from the senators in the cabinet, I am concerned also about the difficulty senators have in trying to resolve everyday concerns. When a phone call is made to a certain department on November 2 and someone promises to return the call, and by November 17 no return call is received, one can only wonder what is our purpose is here.

An Hon. Senator: Question!

Senator Marshall: My question is: In one case, the Minister of Employment and Immigration indicated that an effort would be made to reunite families from foreign countries. It is obvious that such is not happening. I can give the Leader of the Government many instances where there has been complete ignorance of the thrust put forth by honourable senators to various government departments, where senators have been completely ignored. We do not get return phone calls, and apart from the issues of unemployment and the faltering Canadian economy, there are day-to-day problems affecting Canadians that we are trying to solve. It is utterly ridiculous that executive assistants and clerks will not return phone calls from senators who are shouldering their responsibility in trying to protect the rights of Canadians.

Would the Leader of the Government get a member of his staff to contact my office to find out about some of those problems, before something drastic happens across the country and particularly within the confines of this chamber?

[Senator Marshall.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The Honourable Senator Marshall will, I am sure, be the first to admit that every effort is being made, and has been made in the past, to obtain answers to questions which he has posed in the Senate. I had not been made aware, until this time, of any question of urgency which had not been answered since November 2. If the honourable senator feels that the question is of such urgency, he should simply pick up the telephone and call my office. He will then be provided with the best possible service.

Senator Marshall: I am not referring to any question I have asked here; but I had what I thought was a serious problem concerning the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport. I called the director on November 2 and was promised a return phone call. Two days ago I called his office and asked whether they had a record of my original phone call. They replied "Yes, on November 2" but I have still not received a call from the director. It is an absolutely ridiculous situation.

I should tell the Leader of the Government that there is information that is sent to all members of Parliament—the Minister of State for Economic Development would call himself a member of Parliament—but which we, as senators, do not receive. I can give the minister proof in a letter that was sent to me, which says: "Of course, you know that senators do not get the same information as do members of Parliament." It is time the Leader of the Government looked into this matter.

I do not wish to stand here every day to ask questions to which I never receive answers. When I call a department I would like to be recognized for the service I have given to this country over the years, and I should get an answer from any nincompoop who pretends he is at the top level and thinks he does not have to return a senator's phone call. Such a person had better watch out.

Senator Perrault: I hope that the honourable senator will provide the details of the particular problem to which he has referred, and I will personally do everything possible to provide an answer for him, just as I have done in the past.

THE BUDGET

INCOME TAX ACT—CLOSING OF LOOPHOLES

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government.

When he brought down his budget speech, the Minister of Finance had the courage to tell Canadians: From now on, no more loopholes; we are going to get after the people who cheat on their income tax so that they won't be able to dodge their taxes any more.

After hearing this statement which sounded very brave, it was hoped the minister would at long last tell a few people where to get off. But if we take a close look at some of the loopholes referred to by the minister, we find they simply were tax laws passed by former ministers of finance, which the minister just repealed.

Since I have several questions about the loopholes mentioned by the Minister of Finance, could the minister, when the Senate sits tomorrow, table in the Senate a list of such loopholes referred to by the minister, not provided under the government's tax legislation, so that we may find out whether we are dealing with new initiatives in this area or simply repealed or cancelled authorizations and/or rights granted to some Canadians pursuant to specific tax laws? Could the minister table tomorrow all the loopholes the Minister of Finance intends to close in order to prevent people from cheating the Department of National Revenue?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the budget papers were tabled this evening in the Senate, and they contain a wealth of information. It is apparent from the Question Period that not all members of the opposition have felt it important to read through the papers in order to determine exactly what the minister had to say.

An Hon. Senator: They were only tabled tonight.

Senator Perrault: May I offer a further suggestion? After a Question Period, which has been more like a budget debate than Question Period—

An Hon. Senator: Why not? Let's have some fun.

Senator Perrault: I am not criticizing that. I used to serve in the other place with the honourable senator, and I believe that a vigorous debate is an excellent thing in our parliamentary system. Perhaps we should have an inquiry on the state of the economy and the budget. If members of the opposition would like to initiate such an inquiry, it will not be resisted on this side.

Hon. Lowell Murray: As soon as we know what it is.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary concerning the budget and tax shelters.

I have before me the notice of ways and means motion tabled in the House of Commons on Thursday, November 12, which contains all the changes relating to tax shelters. My particular concern is with section 51 which reads as follows:

That for the 1982 and subsequent taxation years, the provisions of section 80.4 of the Act relating to employee and certain other loans be modified

(a) to apply not only to loans but also to other forms of indebtedness,

(b) to withdraw the exclusion for amounts owing in respect of a purchase of shares.

My interpretation of this section, which continues with (c), (d) and so forth, is that in a company, an employee who subscribes to a program for the purchase of shares in the company will no longer be able to deduct the interest costs connected with this transaction. I wonder whether the Minister of Finance could not consider exempting companies where the program was already in existence on the date of the budget, that is on November 12? I feel this would be useful to large corporations and also to their employees who have already purchased shares and are proud to be shareholders in a Canadian company. Since we want to canadianize our industry, I feel that this is a very important section in that respect.

Senator Perrault: The question is taken as notice.

FISHERIES

CLOSURE OF FISH PROCESSING PLANTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer in response to a question asked on October 14 by Senator Marshall. It would take me about four minutes to read this, though I would be happy to do so.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I would be satisfied to have it taken as read.

Senator Olson: I was going to ask that it be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In response to the first question which concerned the problem of closures in fish processing plants I am informed that in September of this year the Department of Fisheries and Oceans adjusted the Atlantic Groundfish Management Plan. As a result more northern cod and Scotian Shelf pollock will be available to the offshore industry. In addition, at the request of the offshore industry, an early opening of the fall Scotian Shelf cod fishery has been announced by the Federal Government.

We realize, however, that making more fish available to processing plants does not address the most critical facets of the problem. These being soft markets and high interest rates. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is presently evaluating the situation. I will keep Honourable Senators informed of any new announcements in this regard.

With regards to Senator Marshall's second question which concerned pollution on the continental shelf, I want to assure all Honourable Senators that although fish stocks are not in any immediate jeopardy, the presence of contaminant residues in marine fish is viewed with concern by the Federal Government.

A number of studies and monitoring programs are being conducted by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to determine the extent and consequences of this pollution.

I would remind Honourable Senators that the Federal Government has introduced controls in the use of PCB and other persistent contaminants by amending the Environmental Contaminants Act. I am informed that preliminary evidence suggests that levels of PCB in surface waters of the Maritimes are declining as a result of these regulatory controls.

In conclusion, I would like to assure the Honourable Senator that the Federal Government through the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is very concerned that we maintain a high quality for our oceans' environment.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REVENUE GAINS AND LOSSES CAUSED BY FOREIGN EXCHANGE FLUCTUATIONS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on June 11, 1981.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Shame!

Senator Argue: This concerns the payment of sterling in respect of sales of wheat to China. I can read the answer, if Senator Roblin wishes, or it can be taken as read.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I think I can describe the answer as "stale dated", and would ask my friend to include it in the proceedings of the house.

(The answer follows:)

During the period when the Board was receiving payment from China in sterling, their holdings of that currency were shown in their Annual Reports. They were valued in accordance with sound accounting principles at the conclusion of each pool account and certified by the auditors appointed by the Governor in Council to examine the Board's accounts.

In the closing months of their sterling contracts with China, there was considerable interest engendered in the net results of the Board's sterling experience during the period of dealings with the currency. In response to this, the Board analyzed the entire period and published in the April 1978 issue of Grain Matters the end result of more than 15 years of sterling transactions with China.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL—VOLUME OF SHIPMENTS—DOCUMENTS Tabled

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin, on November 9, 1981, as to whether or not studies have been made of the use of the port of Churchill.

The most recent study conducted by the Canada Grains Council, "Exporting Grain Through the Port of Churchill, A Capacity, Cost and Systems Analysis", was released May, 1981.

Following the release of the Hall Commission report in April 1977, the Grains Group undertook a consulting study on "Grain Assembly and Cleaning in the Yorkton Area", dated November 4, 1977. This study addressed the logistical problems associated with serving the Hudson Bay route.

The Canada Grains Council report, "Grain Shipping through Churchill", was released in 1976.

[Senator Olson.]

The Manitoba government's Department of Industry and Commerce released its report, "A Study of the Proposal to Create a Free Port Area at Churchill, Manitoba", in November 1973. The proposal was rejected by both levels of government. The Department of Finance's assessment, undertaken at the request of Mr. J. Gowan, M.L.A., is dated February 18, 1981.

The Dominion Marine Association and others have undertaken independent analyses of the prospects for the port of Churchill. However, the only commodity still moving through the port is grain.

Honourable senators, I have a number of studies here that I have collected. I shall be pleased to give them to Senator Roblin.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I must say I give my friend good marks on this one. I shall be happy to have the information.

Senator Argue: Then, honourable senators, I table:

Copy of letter from Allan J. MacEachen, Minister of Finance, to Jay Cowan, M.L.A., Manitoba, dated February 18, 1981, respecting a reply to the brief entitled "The Port of Churchill—A Time for Action" (English text).

Document entitled "Exporting Grain Through the Port of Churchill: A Capacity, Cost and Systems Analysis", dated May 1981, prepared by the Canada Grains Council (English text).

Report prepared for Grains Group respecting grain assembly and cleaning in the Yorkton area, dated November 4, 1977, prepared by Bryden Development Consultants (Western) Ltd. (English text).

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—RECOGNITION OF ROLE OF CANADIAN EMBASSY STAFF IN HOSTAGE-TAKING CRISIS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on October 27 concerning the role of the Canadian embassy staff during the hostage-taking crisis in Iran.

Honourable senators, the Government of Canada extended special recognition to those it believed appropriate because of the risks they took and the roles they played during the crisis. Certainly, anyone who was a member of the embassy staff may take pride in having participated in an action which reflected well on them all.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I would like a clearer explanation. The Leader of the Government in the Senate said that they were "recognized". Would the honourable leader indicate how they were recognized?

Senator Perrault: I stated that the Government of Canada extended special recognition to those it believed appropriate because of the risks they took and the roles they played during the crisis. I said that anyone who was a member of the embassy staff may take pride in having participated in the action which reflected so well on them all.

GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

URBAN TRANSIT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION SYSTEM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 3, Senator Murray asked about the status of the federal commitment to the advanced light rapid transit project in Vancouver.

Earlier this year, British Columbia's Urban Transit Authority signed a contract with Ontario's Urban Transportation Development Corporation, for the purchase of the advanced light rapid transit (ALRT) technology for use in Vancouver. In April, the federal government committed $60 million in 1981-82 dollars to Vancouver's ALRT project, subject to the negotiation of satisfactory terms and conditions regarding federal participation in the project. Negotiations with the Urban Transit Authority are continuing. This federal commitment would be funded by a draw against the envelope of the Cabinet Economic Development Committee.

THE CONSTITUTION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Haidasz on November 9, 1981, as to whether section 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms will be subject to the "notwithstanding" clause agreed to by the federal government and nine provincial governments.

Honourable senators, I can confirm that section 27, which protects Canada's multicultural heritage, will not be subject to the "notwithstanding" clause.

A question was asked by Senator Flynn on November 9, 1981, as to whether Premier Lévesque has been sent a working draft of the new constitutional resolution.

Honourable senators, I can confirm that the Government of Quebec was indeed sent a copy of the working draft of the new constitutional resolution.

On November 9, 1981, Senator Roblin asked a question regarding the subject matter to be discussed in potential meetings between the Government of Quebec and the federal government.

Honourable senators, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister outlined the points that he is prepared to discuss with the Province of Quebec last Saturday, November 14, in Quebec City. Those points fall within the three areas of reservation that Mr. Lévesque raised at the first ministers' meeting.

Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on November 9, 1981, by Senator Flynn, regarding negotiations that took place the night of November 4, 1981.

All ten provinces took part in the First Ministers' Conference on November 4, 1981. That meeting was adjourned at 6 p.m. on that date until 9 a.m. on November 5, 1981. All provinces participated in the formal sessions. What happened between 6 p.m. on November 4 and 9 a.m. the next morning was of an informal nature. There are, of course, no formal records kept of whatever may have gone on during the night. However, it is important to emphasize that all provinces and the federal government were present at all official meetings.

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Flynn on November 10, 1981, concerning the national government's publicity campaign in Quebec.

The first stage of the constitutional publicity campaign in Quebec is over.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Bravo!

Senator Perrault: However, for the information of honourable senators who may be concerned about this point, there will be another stage at a date yet to be determined.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have here a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Roblin on November 10, 1981, concerning the implementation of minority language education rights by the provinces.

Eight provinces—Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia—have agreed to implement minority education rights. The implementation in these provinces is not conditional.

In Manitoba, that item is subject to the approval of the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba before implementation. There may be a new government in Manitoba this evening. It is hard to tell. As honourable senators may be aware, the Prime Minister has offered to negotiate a compromise that will satisfy the Quebec government.

Honourable senators, I now come to an answer to the question raised by Senator Roblin on November 10, 1981, as to which provinces wanted fiscal compensation dropped from the amending formula.

Nine provinces agreed to this provision being dropped, the exception being Quebec. I am not at liberty to offer further details of negotiations. However, it is obvious that seven provinces altered the stance they had taken on April 16, 1981, in respect to section 3 of the amending formula they agreed to on that date.

There are one or two other questions which I shall answer tomorrow.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps I could ask a supplementary question in connection with that last statement. I really did not want to know whether the provinces agreed to it, but whether they proposed it; and if they did not, who did propose it? Can my honourable friend tell me who proposed the dropping of the fiscal equivalent from the amending formula?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

URBAN TRANSIT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION SYSTEM

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question with regard to the Vancouver light rapid transit system which my honourable friend told us was part of the economic package. What is its relationship to the Western Development Fund? Is it considered as a payment against the Western Development Fund, or is it quite different?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a further statement will be made at some appropriate time in the near future with regard to that.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, did the minister not indicate some months ago, when I was asking questions on this very subject, that some of the federal moneys for this project would come from the energy envelope?

Senator Perrault: I cannot recall my comments on that occasion. I am sure they were accurate. I do not, however, have at hand the precise text of those alleged earlier remarks.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—RECOGNITION OF ROLE OF CANADIAN EMBASSY STAFF IN HOSTAGE-TAKING CRISIS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a further supplementary question with regard to the special recognition which the Leader of the Government indicated was given to those personnel who served in Tehran. I would like to know what this special recognition entailed. Was it a certificate? Was it an award? Was it a medal? Was it a bonus? What recognition was given?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators are aware, of course, that at least four Canadians who participated in that valiant exercise of protecting those American refugees in the embassy of Tehran have been inducted as members of the Order of Canada. Those referred to in my reply have been given this special recognition.

The others who played an important part have not, I understand, been given any official recognition for doing so. I presume that that is the recommendation being offered by Senator Marshall.

Senator Marshall: The Leader of the Government has finally come to the point I am trying to make, which is with regard to those employees who have not as yet received recognition, though they were still on a dangerous mission. I would like to know how those people are going to be recognized as they ought to be. Is it the intention of the Department of National Defence or the Department of External Affairs to show recognition to those people who are not as yet recognized and who should be along with the others?

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Perrault: The Honourable Senator Marshall, with his military background, understands that if this had been a military exercise, perhaps a unit citation would have been awarded to all of those who served at the Tehran embassy. The action in Tehran was rather unprecedented. While no official recognition has been given to all of those who participated in that valiant Canadian exercise, thanks have certainly been extended from the nation to all of those who served in the embassy.

If the Honourable Senator Marshall has a suggestion as to some more tangible form of recognition, the government will listen with a great deal of interest to his proposals.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, although I stand second to nobody in this chamber or in this country with regard to making available the electoral machinery of the country so that we could have a change of government, I nevertheless ask honourable senators that this item be allowed to stand until December 17. I have had discussions with the Honourable Senator Frith and with the mover of the motion, the Honourable Senator Austin, who has been elevated from, shall we say, a private member of this august body to a ministerial member. I would be grateful if it would be acceptable to stand this order to December 17, Deo volente, as we say in the Presbyterian Church.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cameron, for the adoption of the Seventh Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Godfrey moved what we might call a companion order to be dealt with on November 25. Perhaps we should stand this order until November 25.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled: "They Served—We Care", tabled in the Senate on 20th October, 1981.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Thompson has told me that he wishes to speak to this order. There is some preparatory work he wants to do that cannot be done until the end of the month. I ask that this order stand until December 1, and that it stand in the name of Senator Thompson. If any other senator wishes to speak on the subject in the meantime, I am sure that Senator Thompson would be glad to yield.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL SESSION, MUNICH, WEST GERMANY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bonnell calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-seventh Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Munich, Federal Republic of Germany, from 11th to 16th October, 1981, and in particular to the discussion and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order stands in the name of Senator Langlois, and I believe it does because he was acting as deputy leader on an occasion on which the order was called. He adjourned it in his name simply to keep it open. I understand that Senator Hastings proposes to speak to this order but does not wish to do so this week. I suggest that this order stand until next week in the name of Senator Hastings. If some other senator wishes to speak to it, I am sure that Senator Hastings will yield.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 3005)

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

NINTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

TUESDAY, November 17, 1981

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Ninth Report as follows:

(Statutory Instruments No. 14)

1. In accordance with its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Joint Committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses SOR/81-892, Order Varying Canadian Transport Commission Orders and Decisions. (For convenience this regulation will be referred to as "the Order".)
2. Your Joint Committee's objections to the Order rest on four of its criteria, namely:
 - "Whether any Regulation or other Statutory Instrument within its terms of reference, in the judgment of the Committee:
 2. has not complied with the provisions of the Statutory Instruments Act with respect to transmittal, recording, numbering or publication;
 4. makes some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the enabling statute . . .
 8. appears for any reason to infringe . . . the rules of natural justice;
 10. in the absence of express authority to that effect in the enabling statute or prerogative, appears to amount to the exercise of a substantive legislative power properly the subject of direct parliamentary enactment, and not merely to the formulation of subordinate provisions of a technical or administrative character properly the subject of delegated legislation;"
3. Your Committee is aware that litigation is currently based in part on a challenge to the validity of the Order as an exercise of the power conferred on the Governor in Council under section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act. While it is aware of the doubts as to the validity of the Order, and has itself considered the matter, your Committee has not sought to form a judgment on the Order in terms of vires because this issue is before the courts.
4. The Order was made on 6th August 1981 by P.C. 1981-2171. It proceeds by varying a number of Orders and decisions of the Canadian Transport Commission. The effect of the Order is to reduce the railway passenger network of Canada by approximately one fifth in terms of routes serviced. The authority for the Order is expressed to be subsection (1) of section 64 of the National Transportation Act. The other subsections of section 64 relate to appeals from Orders or decisions of the Commission and the whole section is set out in full to give to subsection (1) its context which has remained similar, although not identical, since the Railway Act, 1903, 3 Edward VII, c. 58.

"64. (1) The Governor in Council may at any time, in his discretion, either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or of his own motion, and without any petition or application, vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the Commission, whether such order or decision is made inter partes or otherwise, and whether such regulation is general or limited in its scope and application; and any order that the Governor in Council may make with respect thereto is binding upon the Commission and upon all parties.

(2) An appeal lies from the Commission to the Federal Court of Appeal upon a question of law, or a question of jurisdiction, upon leave therefor being obtained from the Court upon application made within one month after the making of the order, decision, rule or regulation sought to be appealed from or within such further time as a judge of that Court under special circumstances allows, and upon notice to the parties and the Commission, and upon hearing such of them as appear and desire to be heard; and the costs of such application are in the discretion of that Court.

(3) No appeal, after leave therefor has been obtained under subsection (2), lies unless it is entered in the Federal Court of Appeal within sixty days from the making of the order granting leave to appeal.

(4) Upon such leave being obtained the party so appealing shall deposit in the Court the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, by way of security for costs; and the said appeal shall be heard by the Court as speedily as practicable.

(5) On the hearing of any appeal, the Court may draw all such inferences as are not inconsistent with the facts expressly found by the Commission, and are necessary for determining the question of jurisdiction, or law, as the case may be, and shall certify its opinion to the Commission, and the Commission shall make an order in accordance with such opinion.

(6) The Commission is entitled to be heard by counsel or otherwise, upon the argument of any such appeal.

(7) Neither the Commission nor any member of the Commission is in any case liable to any costs by reason or in respect of any appeal or application under this section."

5. In your Committee's judgment, the Order is a "regulation" within the meaning of the Statutory Instruments Act as it is a "statutory instrument" as defined in that Act and was made in the exercise of a legislative power by the Governor in Council. Your Committee notes that this view of the Order has now been accepted by the Legal Advisers to the Privy Council Section of the Department of Justice as possibly being valid and that the Order was registered as a regulation on 3rd November 1981, as SOR/81-892 and published in Part II of the Canada Gazette albeit "out of an abundance of caution" as expressed in court by counsel for the Government in the litigation referred to in paragraph 3 above. Your Committee notes that pursuant to the Statutory Instruments Regulations there appear in Part II of the Canada Gazette regulations, five specific classes of statutory and other instruments (none of which includes the Order now under report) and such other statutory instruments or documents as the Clerk of the Privy Council may direct or authorize. Having already published the Order in Part I of the Canada Gazette on 15th August 1981 in the public interest, it seems unlikely to your Committee that the Clerk of the Privy Council would have ordered it to be published again in Part II simply as "a document" the publication of which is in his opinion in the public interest. Your Committee also notes that only regulations are recorded under SOR numbers and that SI numbers are used for mere statutory instruments and other instruments and documents appearing in Part II of the Gazette.

Your Committee trusts that the registration of the Order marks the demise of the "magic formula" approach to the definition of a "statutory instrument" which your Committee and its predecessor condemned in their general reports of 1977 and 1980—(1). This approach requires that an enabling power be expressed in terms of a preposition and noun such as "by order" or "by regulation" before the resulting subordinate legislation can be accounted a statutory instrument. Your Committee places on record that the traditional Department of Justice view of the definition of a "statutory instrument" is also inconsistent with the registration, as SOR/80-148, of Order in Council P.C. 1980-519 which varied the Air Carrier Regulations as made by the Canadian Transport Commission, and with SOR/81-694, Statutory Instruments Regulations, amendment, which exempts from certain requirements specified in the Statutory Instruments Act for regulations, instruments not made pursuant to "magic formula" enabling powers.

6. Section 5(1) of the Statutory Instruments Act requires that "every regulation-making authority shall, within seven days after making a regulation... transmit copies of the regulation in both official languages to the Clerk of the Privy Council for registration pursuant to section 6". Section 6 provides that the Clerk of the Privy Council shall register every regulation transmitted to him pursuant to section 5(1). Your Committee notes that the Order was made on 6th August 1981 and was registered on 3rd November 1981. It is clear that the Order was never dealt with as a proposed regulation and scrutinized, before it was made, under section 3 of the Statutory Instruments Act. Neither was it treated as a document the exact status of which as a regulation was in doubt, under section 4 of that Act. Although the Order was voluntarily published in the Canada Gazette Part I on 15th August 1981, this does not account to or indicate registration as a regulation pursuant to section 6 of the Statutory Instruments Act, and the Order was not transmitted within seven days of its making on 6th August 1981 to the Clerk of the Privy Council for registration as a regulation. In terms of its criterion 2, therefore, your Committee reports that the Order was not scrutinized in its proposed form by the Clerk of the Privy Council in consultation with the Department of Justice, as required by section 3 of the Statutory Instruments Act, and was not transmitted within seven days of its making to the Clerk for registration as a regulation, as required by section 5 of that Act.

7. Section 8 of the Statutory Instruments Act relieves against the consequences of failure to observe the requirements of section 3 and expressly states that failure to have a proposed regulation scrutinized in that form before making does not for that reason alone invalidate it. There is no such relieving provision for failure to transmit for registration within seven days of making. The Government has taken the risk that in the litigation now in progress the courts will hold that section 5(1) of the Statutory Instruments Act expresses a mandatory requirement the non-observance of which will render the registration effected as SOR/81-892 null and void. The result of such a finding would be that the Order, never having been properly registered, would never have entered into force under section 9(1) of the Statutory Instruments Act. Even if the final decision of the courts is that section 5(1) embodies only a directory requirement, there is the issue of whether or not there has been substantial compliance with it. There is some doubt as to whether registration of the eighty-eighth day after the Order was made amounts to substantial compliance with a requirement of transmittal for registration within seven days of making, and of registration thereafter.

8. Your Committee is aware that strong arguments can be made on both sides of the question as to whether section 5(1) is mandatory or directory. No doubt these arguments have been made in the current litigation. In the one case so far heard a single judge of the Federal Court held on 11 November that section 5(1) is directory only. This decision may be appealed. The final result of the current litigation will be of peculiar significance to your Committee which is responsible to Parliament for the oversight of the regulation-making processes of the Statutory Instruments Act. Your Committee cannot but be concerned that the statutory requirements laid down by Parliament in the Statutory Instruments Act might become mere expressions of pious intent to be disregarded at will in the interests of administrative convenience or the retrieval of past errors.

9. In assessing the Order in terms of criteria 4, 8 and 10, your Committee had perforce to consider matters far wider than those already noted. In keeping with its mandate and with the traditions of parliamentary scrutiny committees on subordinate legislation, your Committee did not consider and is not now reporting on the merits of the policy embodied in the Order. Whether the cutbacks in railway passenger services are a good thing or not is none of your Committee's business. Your Committee is concerned, as ever, with the means used to achieve policy ends, and not with those ends themselves. This point was very succinctly put by Mr. E. G. Abbott, Executive Secretary of the Canadian Railway Labour Association, in evidence before the Committee:

"The merits and demerits of rail passenger service are not the issue. That will come and go. That will find its way and resolve itself whatever happens. The more important factor is that we are giving governments the power to move by regulation . . . I think the strength and power of Parliament is far more important than VIA Rail will ever be, in the long run . . ."

10. In forming the judgment that the Order constitutes an unusual and unexpected use of the power conferred on the Governor in Council and amounts to a substantive legislative enactment that should have been dealt with by Parliament itself, your Committee has considered the history of the use of section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act. Section 64(1) first appears in its current form as section 44(2) of the Railway Act, 1903. The remaining seven subsections of that section dealt with appeals from orders or decisions of the Board of Transport Commissioners. At that time appeals to the Supreme Court were limited to matters of jurisdiction by leave of a judge of the Court and on other matters of law by leave of the Board. The orders and decisions of the Board were otherwise protected by a strong privative clause—(2) of a kind that would at that time probably have been treated as conclusive by the courts. (The privative clause finally disappeared in 1970 on the enactment of the Federal Court Act.) Clearly, in 1903, whatever other purpose section 44(2) of the Railway Act served, it did provide a safety valve when the Board of Transport Commissioners refused leave to appeal, or acted in some mistaken way. The Governor in Council's jurisdiction was clearly supervisory, as later held in C.S.P. Foods Ltd. v. Canadian Transport Commission (1978) 84 D.L.R. (3d), 54. Insofar as his power to amend regulations of the Board, and later of the Canadian Transport Commission, is concerned, this is in a real sense a weaker version of the supervisory power exercised by the Governor in Council over many regulation-making bodies and expressed in the form: "may, with the approval of the Governor in Council make regulations". The Transport Commission does not have to obtain approval of its proposed regulations, but the regulations might be varied or revoked if the Governor in Council disapproves of them, either on policy grounds or on legal grounds. It goes without saying that the powers of the Governor in Council have always been limited to the purposes and objects of the statutes under which the Board or the Canadian Transport Commission operated. Clearly, the Governor in Council could not make a new Order or regulation or so amend an existing one that it would become a regulation or order that would have been ultra vires the Board or the Commission.

11. Neither the Department of Transport nor the Canadian Transport Commission was able to supply your Committee with details of all instances of the use by the Governor in Council of his power under section 64(1) and its predecessor subsections back to 1903. Those instances known to your Committee are summarized in Appendix I to this Report. It would appear that the power of the Governor in Council has been used mostly on petition, as an appeal mechanism, although it is clear that the power is not so limited but is supervisory and can be exercised by the Governor in Council of his own motion. It is also apparent that there has almost invariably been a timely connection between the order of decision of the Canadian Transport Commission and its variation, suspension or rescission by the Governor in Council. Supervision carries with it the notion of correction when an error has been made or has been discovered. The only known cases in which His Excellency has used his power to act of his own motion are the present one, the variation of the Air Carrier Regulations in early 1980, and the restoration of daily passenger service on the Sudbury-White River line in 1978 by Order in Council 1978-3042. An Order was made by the Canadian Transport Commission on a particular matter—the number of services per week on the Sudbury-White River route—and that Order was in short order overruled by the Governor in Council.

12. The 1980 amendment of the Air Carrier Regulations by Order in Council 1980-519, registered as SOR/80-148, raises serious issues. The Governor in Council's action of his own motion to alter the Regulations to overcome a legislative decision recently arrived at by the Canadian Transport Commission was announced and taken swiftly. Yet, it must be noted that some provisions of the Regulations that had stood for thirteen months were amended in a consequential fashion in order to accomplish the Governor in Council's objective. It might also be said that the use of section 64(1) to accomplish a major change in policy was, in light of the earlier uses of the power, unusual and not to be expected. It may be that a power which properly existed had lain dormant for seventy-seven years. Your Committee cannot but conclude that it was and is surprising that a supervisory power of the Governor in Council was used for the first time to upset a legislative scheme, albeit a subordinate or delegated one, arrived at by the body charged by Parliament with the duty to do so as a matter of public convenience and necessity under the Aeronautics Act. That said, it must be admitted that the Governor in Council was substituting his view of the proper classification of commercial air licences and their terms for that formed by the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission pursuant to section 14(1)(a) of the Aeronautics Act. In the case of the Order now under report, as will be seen, the Governor in Council has not substituted his view of the result of the application of the statutory tests to be applied by the Canadian Transport Commission, but rather has proceeded on the basis of a consideration which, as will be discussed later, that Commission could not itself have entertained. Therefore, while the Order amending the Air Carrier Regulations may have been unusual and unexpected in your Committee's judgment, it does not constitute any precedent for the present Order.

13. The Order now under report goes beyond any known Order in Council as an unusual and unexpected use of the power conferred by section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act. A timely connection between the orders and decisions of the Canadian Transport Commission affected and the Order is almost entirely lacking. Appendix II to this Report shows the date of the last public hearings held in respect of each service to be eliminated or reduced. The customary approach to the discontinuance of railway service in this country by decision of the Canadian Transport Commission after a relevant and contemporary public hearing has not been followed. Orders of the Canadian Transport Commission, some of which were part of regional transportation plans, and all of which have been acted upon and relied upon for a considerable time, have been abruptly overturned. The Governor in Council has at a stroke remodelled an entire industry or transport mode. He has used his power to proceed by Executive action to alter radically and very extensively an industry pattern which has been established by the existing processes put in place by Parliament for the very purpose. It may be that those processes as well as the existing industrial pattern are no longer suitable or desirable. But those are matters Parliament should have been, and should be, called upon to debate and to settle.

14. Your Committee is not unmindful of the awkward position in which the Government of Canada finds itself. It was the opinion of Mr. Keith Thompson, Senior Legal Adviser, Rail, at the Canadian Transport Commission, given in evidence before your Committee, that the Railway Act does not permit "the Minister of Transport to direct the Canadian Transport Commission to hold hearings with a view towards discontinuance and the savings of dollars". It would in your Committee's opinion be unlawful to give a specific direction to the Canadian Transport Commission to save $100 million by eliminating particular services so that the money saved could be spent on new equipment for use on some of the remaining services. Parliament has already ordained the matters the Canadian Transport Commission may and shall consider. The basis of the Government's policy, the saving of a global sum of money over the whole industry, is not one of them. Neither the regular quinquennial reviews by the Canadian Transport Commission of its individual orders nor a further overall review of the railway passenger system under the existing Railway Act, such as that carried out between 1976 and 1979, may produce the budgetary results desired by the Government. All this may be difficult from the Government's point of view. Yet your Committee must observe that this difficulty is of the Executive's own making. Successive governments have declined to bring in legislation to set up VIA Rail Canada on a normal statutory footing and to have Parliament define its mandate. This is the case despite appeals for a clear mandate in the two last general reports of VIA Rail Canada. Governments have not sought to amend the Railway Act so as to introduce new factors which the Canadian Transport Commission should consider in applications to abandon railway services. Governments have not sought to obtain from Parliament power to issue binding policy directives to the Canadian Transport Commission. Government has never taken Parliament or the public into its confidence by enunciating a railway passenger policy and then seeking to give that policy legislative expression. The Executive can not now be heard to complain if it is criticized for misusing section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act. It has taken a supervisory power to change particular regulatory results and sought to use it to legislate generally by designing a new railway passenger system for Canada. The Minister of Transport is very frank when he acknowledges this and admits that the Order is the first made under section 64(1) to achieve the wide implementation of policy. The conclusion is inescapable that the Governor in Council has not reviewed or supervised the work of the Canadian Transport Commission. He has instead used section 64(1) as a vehicle for the execution of his own policy, a policy based on a premiss which runs counter to that laid down by Parliament in section 260 of the Railway Act. Parliament did not ordain that a factor, even the overriding factor, was that in the Government's view the cost of subsidizing railway services could not be afforded. Parliament seems instead to have decided that the cost was to be afforded if the Transport Commission decided that it was in the public interest that one or more uneconomic passenger services be maintained. What the Governor in Council has done strikes your Committee as being a political act of high policy and properly Parliament's business.

15. Your Committee recommends, as it did in its Seventh Report for this Session, (Statutory Instruments No. 12) that legislation be brought in to set up VIA Rail Canada, to define its mandate, functions and relationship with the operating railway companies, and to make detailed provision for the services it is to provide and for the manner in which those services may be changed.

16. Your Committee is also troubled by the possible precedent the present Order might establish. It is obvious that if the Governor in Council can by a subordinate legislative act under section 64(1) eliminate one fifth of the railway passenger service in this country, he could as a matter of policy equally close down every service. He could range back to any extent to rescind or vary any order or decision of the Canadian Transport Commission. If Parliament had ever intended such a result, your Committee would expect to find section 64(1) to have been drawn quite differently. The Canadian Transport Commission may use its powers to permit abandonment of services only for the purposes and in accordance with the criteria laid down in the Railway Act. It may abandon a service, or order it continued, whereupon a subsidy is to be paid. If the Governor in Council may proceed wholly on a policy footing for purposes and on considerations foreign to those which govern the Canadian Transport Commission, it seems to your Committee that he should not be relying on a power given to him to correct and supervise the Commission. If the Governor in Council is not to be bound by the same considerations as bind the Commission, Parliament should clearly say so.

17. Closure of railway passenger services in this country has traditionally been one of those areas of public administration attended by notice and comment procedures. These have taken the form of notice and public hearings before the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission and its predecessors. Apart from "leaks" no notice was given to those affected, whether users or employees, even though the actual cuts in service now made were under active consideration as far back as March 1980 and probably earlier. No opportunity has been given for public input or representations. No chance has been given to anyone to challenge the statistics on which the Government has based its actions. Here your Committee notes that up-to-date statistics are always compiled for hearings on particular services by the Railway Transport Committee and otherwise do not exist. The Governor in Council has not only run the risk of proceeding on an incorrect statistical basis but has also deprived himself of the opportunity to show that he has used accurate figures to justify the policy pursued and to demonstrate its wisdom. Your Committee is well aware that as a matter of law no procedural safeguards burden the Governor in Council when acting under section 64(1). Nevertheless, it concludes that, given the customs and usages of Canada, this latest use of section 64(1) amounts to a breach of the rules of natural justice. It also amounts to a negation of the extensive recommendations of your Committee as to the need for notice and comment procedures as contained in its Fourth Report for this Session (Statutory Instruments No. 10). Reliance on hearings held three years ago and more in an entirely different context is not satisfaction of a genuine notice and comment procedure. The Governor in Council's manner of proceeding in this instance also flies in the face of the specific recommendations of the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Regulatory Reform for the observance of "procedural decencies" when the Governor in Council acts of his own motion under section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act. The Canadian Transport Commission would not order the discontinuance of a single service, far less a wholesale abandonment of services, without prior notice to and hearing from the public. It does not appear to your Committee that the Governor in Council should do so. An opportunity for the public to be heard might take many forms, including the successful technique used in 1980, a Special Committee of the House of Commons.

Appendix I

Known uses of Section 64(1) National Transportation Act by the Governor General in Council to vary or rescind orders, decisions, rules or regulations of the Canadian Transport Commission or the Board of Transport Commissioners or the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission.

P.C. 1933-349 dated 25th February 1933

On appeals by three provincial Attorneys General and the United Farmers of British Columbia against Board of Transport Commissioner's General Order 448 on freight rates dated 26th August 1927, appeal denied. The petitions of the appellants were lodged in 1929 and were heard before the Council. The delay in decision was due to a change in Government. The Council quoted from an earlier Order in Council P.C. 1923-2166:

"... the intent of the legislation is to invest His Excellency with judicial powers by which he may in his discretion aid in securing and enforcing the provisions of the Railway Act, having due regard to the method of railway rate regulation by an independent Commission which was the outstanding innovation in the Railway Act of 1903 and which has been preserved throughout succeeding revisions of the Act to the present time."

The Council also quoted from Order in Council P.C. 1927-1170:

"... in appeals to the Governor in Council from the Board of Railway Commissioners a practice has grown up not to interfere with an Order of the Board unless it seems manifest that the Board has proceeded upon some wrong principle, or that it has been otherwise subject to error. Where the matters at issue are questions of fact depending for their solution upon a mass of conflicting expert testimony, or are otherwise such as the Board is peculiarly fitted to determine, it has been customary, except as aforesaid, not to interfere with the findings of the Board."

In dismissing the appeals, the Privy Council noted:

"The Railway Act of 1903, under which the Board was created, constituted the Board a Court of Record with all the powers of such a court as to the hearing of witnesses and obtaining of evidence. The members of the Board, in addition to their own long and varied experience, have available for the purposes of their investigations a permanent staff of expert officers and a complete system of records, which render that tribunal peculiarly qualified to deal with the intricate and highly technical subjects such as those involved in the said judgment from which the appeals were taken.

One of the most important subjects involved in the said appeals was grain shipped from prairie points to points in British Columbia for use for feeding purposes, it being alleged that by a reduction in the rates of the lower grades of grain not only would an outlet be provided for a large quantity of grain which was not marketable under present conditions, but the development of the dairy and poultry industries of British Columbia would be greatly assisted.

As a result of negotiations which took place with members of the Government of the Provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba during the period of the recent Interprovincial Conference, the representatives of the railway companies intimated that in order to assist in the movement of the lower grades of grain for the purposes outlined above, they would be prepared to put into effect tentatively substantial reductions in rates on the grades of grain involved. This offer has since been accepted by the Governments of the said provinces as satisfactory to them.

Having in view the facts found by the Board in the said judgment, being General Order No. 448, dated the 26th day of August, 1927, and having regard to the principles recognized under the previous Orders in Council as governing the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Governor in Council on applications made to him under the provisions of s. 52 of the Railway Act, as above referred to, the Committee are of opinion that further action on the part of the Governor in Council in reference to the matters involved in the said appeals should not be taken, and advise that the said appeals be dismissed."

The principles enunciated by the Governor in Council in this instance appear to be inconsistent, to some degree at least, with his later actions in ensuing decades.

1942:

An appeal from Order 62062 of the Board of Transport Commissioners dated 1 April 1942 permitting the New York Central Railway Company to reduce service between Malone, New York and Montreal. The Governor in Council directed the Board to review the situation and pending such review to extend the effective date of its Order. (The Board later confirmed its earlier decision). See New York Central Railway Company v. City of Valleyfield, Québec (1942) 56 C.R.T.C. 234.

P.C. 1948-4678

On petition by seven provincial governments the Governor in Council allowed to stand a 21% increase in freight rates decided upon by the Board of Transport Commissioners in the 1946-48 General Rate Increase Case, unless and until altered by the Board in the disposition of an already pending application for a further rate increase of 20%. The Board was directed to consider the opinion of the Committee of Council that some portion of the corporate needs of the railway companies should be borne by income derived from non-railway operations. It was also directed to determine the apportionment to be made between railway earnings and "other income". See Re. General Increase in Freight Rates (1948) 62 C.R.T.C. 273.

P.C. 1959-569 dated 7th May 1959

The Governor in Council suspended Board of Transport Commissioner's Order 94426 of 27 March 1958. He directed the Board to suspend the tariffs dependent on it. The Order had had the effect of reducing the number of days of free time for demurrage purposes at western grain terminals. The Governor in Council's Order was prospective only. See C.P.R. v. Manitoba Pool Elevators (1963) 39 D.L.R. (2d) 475.

P.C. 1973-871 dated 9th April 1973

The Governor in Council varied a decision of the Canadian Transport Commission dated 30 March 1973 on a Bell Canada Tariff increase application dated 10 November 1972 by postponing to 3 July 1973 the date on which the tariff increases came into effect.

P.C. 1973-1765 dated 21 June 1973

The Governor in Council further varied Canadian Transport Commission's decision of 30 March 1973 on Bell Canada Tariff increases by revoking 50 per cent increases in certain service charges.

P.C. 1976-894 dated 13th April 1976

The Governor in Council varied orders of the Canadian Transport Commission relating to rapeseed carriage as follows:

- (a) Order No. R-16824 dated June 27, 1973;
- (b) Order No. R-17016 dated August 2, 1973; and
- (c) any other Order or decision of the Canadian Transport Commission that is inconsistent with paragraph (d) hereof to provide

(d) that the following rates or portions of rates for domestic and export movement of rapeseed meal and rapeseed oil from the four rapeseed crushing plants at Altona, Nipawin, Saskatoon and Lethbridge, be established annually at minimum compensatory levels:

- (i) rates for rapeseed meal and rapeseed oil moving west;
- (ii) rates for rapeseed oil moving east; and
- (iii) the portions of rates pertaining to the movement of rapeseed meal east of Thunder Bay or Armstrong, Ontario.

This is popularly known as the Rapeseed Case and followed litigation. The Canadian Transport Commission made new orders to give effect to the Order in Council. These orders led to the further Order in Council 1977-362. The Order in Council was considered in Re. C.S.P. Foods Ltd. and C.T.C. (1978) 84 D.L.R. (3d) 541. The Federal Court of Appeal held that the Governor in Council's power under Section 64(1) was "supervisory". The litigation concerned the power of the Commission in interpreting the phrase "minimum compensatory levels" used in the Order in Council.

P.C. 1976-2066 dated 5 August 1976

On petition by the Attorney General of British Columbia the Governor in Council suspended Decision No. 4886 of the Air Transport Committee permitting Pacific Western Airlines to remove its headquarters and repair and maintenance facilities.

ties from British Columbia pending the outcome of an appeal in the Supreme Court of Canada.

P.C. 1977-362 dated 18 February 1977

The Governor in Council varied two Orders of the Canadian Transport Commission:

(a) Order No. R-16824 or 27 June 1973 as varied by Order in Council P.C. 1976-894; and

(b) Order No. R-17016 dated 2 August 1973 as varied by Order in Council 1976-894, in order to provide that, regardless of the validity, when prescribed, of Canadian Transport Commission Orders No. R-23976 dated November 26, 1976 and No. R-24045 dated December 16, 1976 purporting to be in conformity with Order in Council P.C. 1976-894, the reasons set out in Appendix "A" to said Order No. R-23976 express the intention of the Governor in Council and the provisions for tariffs of tolls or rates prescribed in Schedule "A" to said Order No. R-23976 as amended by said Order No. R-24045 are binding upon the Canadian Transport Commission and upon all parties.

(This Order is a continuation of the Rapeseed Case).

P.C. 1977-2026 and 2027 dated 14 July 1977

On appeals dated 9th and 10th June 1981 to the Governor in Council from a decision dated 1st June 1977 on telephone tariffs in the Northwest Territories, appeals denied. See Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada et al (1980) 115 D.L.R. (3d) 1.

P.C. 1977-3152 dated 3 November 1977

The Governor in Council on petition varied a decision of the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission dated 14th August 1977 so as to approve the "Telesat Canada's Proposed Agreement". This really had the effect of reversing the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission's decision, and substituting the Governor in Council's own decision. The Order in Council recites the receipt of petitions but also states that the Governor in Council acted "of his own motion". These two statements seem to be contradictory. See Consumers' Association of Canada v. Attorney General of Canada (1978) 87 D.L.R. (ed) 33.

P.C. 1978-3042 dated 27 September 1978

The Governor in Council on his own motion varied Canadian Transport Commission Decision No. R-26520 dated 8 March 1978 in order to increase passenger service on the Sudbury-White River line as proposed by VIA Rail Canada Inc. in submission of July 1978 to the Canadian Transport Commission referred to in Railway Transport Committee decision of 15 September 1978.

P.C. 1980-519 dated 12 February 1980

The Governor in Council of his own motion varied the Air Carrier Regulations as amended a month earlier by the Canadian Transport Commission in accordance with a decision announced two months earlier. The effect of the variation was to widen the class of air carriers who might apply to operate charter flights.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance on the Administration of the Investment Companies Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 27(1) of the said Act, Chapter 33, Statutes of Canada, 1970-71-72.

THE CONSTITUTION

TEXT OF RESOLUTION TO BE TABLED IN PARLIAMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Could the Leader of the Government tell us whether or not, as was suggested yesterday, the new constitutional resolution will be tabled today in the other place and here also, if we are still sitting?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I spoke with the house leader in the other place only 10 minutes ago. The honourable the minister stated that as of now there is a 99 per cent chance that the notice of motion will be tabled in the other place at some point this afternoon, and it is anticipated that debate on the motion may well commence on Friday of this week. That is the latest information made known to me.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Does that mean that the consultations which have been going on for a few days between the federal government, on the one hand, and the provinces and other groups, such as Indians, on the other, are now over? Is that phase completely finished and is the drafting of the final text the only thing left to do?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand that a helpful amount of useful consultation has been held, the details of which are not available to me at this time.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: In particular, have consultations been held with the premier-elect of Manitoba?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: That would go smoother.

Senator Flynn: Not with the Manitoba Liberal opposition though!

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS CONCERNING RIGHTS OF NATIVE PEOPLES

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I too have a question for Senator Austin. I heard this morning that there is no chance of getting section 34, on native rights, back in the accord. I was wondering if the minister has had a chance to meet the people from Yellowknife and the Northwest Territories.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Adams for his question. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and I met with the Council of the Northwest Territories during the lunch hour today, and discussed their representations, which are, essentially, three in number. They are: First, that section 34 be reinstated in the joint resolution so far as federal jurisdiction is concerned; secondly, that paragraph 9(e) of the so-called Vancouver formula—the provision allowing extension of provincial boundaries northward—be deleted from the accord, or agreement, of November 5; and thirdly, that section 9(f) of the so-called Vancouver formula be deleted, this being a provision that would require the federal government, if it sought to create new provinces in the Yukon or the Northwest Territories, to proceed under the general amending formula to obtain the concurrence of the provinces.

Those matters were discussed, Senator Adams. I cannot tell you the outcome of representations made during a visit by the Council of the Northwest Territories to Ottawa this week but, as Senator Perrault has said, some time later today the joint resolution will be made available in the other place, and perhaps here, if we have not adjourned prior to that time, and we will then have the actual document before us.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Do you mean that at that time we will finally be given the replies to the questions we have raised?

THE ECONOMY

INTENTIONS OF GOVERNMENT RE 1980 POVERTY LINE UPDATE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the poverty line figures which have just been published, and which I received in my office today.

There are over one million persons in Canada living below the poverty line. According to the 1980 poverty line figures, established by one of our Senate committees, a family of two requires an annual income of $11,000. Those living on the veterans' allowances are only receiving $752.30 per month. I wonder if the government leader could find out what the government's intentions are with regard to reviewing old age security pensions, war veterans' allowances, widows' pensions and the like, to bring people up to a reasonable standard of living in today's inflationary times.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government has a continuing concern for the less fortunate in our society. Again, this was reflected in the recent budget where, despite all the predictions of the opposition, the social programs were left intact, and, indeed, enhanced. The detail requested by the honourable senator will be sought, and information will be provided.

THE CONSTITUTION

TEXT OF RESOLUTION TO BE PRESENTED TO PARLIAMENT— DISTRIBUTION TO SENATORS—TIMING OF DEBATE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the text of the draft resolution to which reference has been made. If it should happen that that draft is unavailable for distribution in this chamber before we adjourn, could arrangements be made to distribute it to the offices of senators as soon as it is available?

● (1410)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as soon as the information is made available, it will be circulated to the best of the ability of the government.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government a question on the same matter? In light of the anticipated presentation of the resolution today or tomorrow in the other place, should we assume that the resolution will be debated in this chamber next week, or is the timetable firm enough to indicate a date at this time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, when the notice of motion has been tabled in the other place, it is the intention of the government to hold meetings involving the leadership of the parties in both chambers to discuss how this matter may be most usefully debated. It is expected that the debate will commence first in the other place and at some later point—which date will most certainly be discussed with the Leader of the Opposition here—debate in this chamber will be held.

[Senator Flynn.]

Discussions may well take place in the other place this evening or tomorrow morning with respect to the length and terms of the debate, whether or not it may be possible to establish a set time for a vote, and matters of that kind. It is the intention to table the notice of motion as soon as possible in the Senate as well, so that the motion will be on our order paper. From that point we can then proceed to determine our debating schedule here.

Senator Smith: On that point I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question of the Leader of the Government. Is it reasonable to assume that the house order in the other place limiting the length of the debate to two days is no longer considered by the leadership in that place to be applicable?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course, the original motion has been withdrawn in the other place. I may have a similar proposal later this afternoon with respect to that same motion on our order paper. It may be that the wording of the new motion will be received so ecstatically that the members of the other place may wish to give it immediate unanimous consent. That is always a possibility. It is more likely, however, that the debate will go on for at least two days, and perhaps longer.

NATIONAL DEBT—STATEMENT BY AUDITOR GENERAL

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Yesterday, in the House of Commons Committee on Public Accounts, the Auditor General stated that the Department of Finance was not estimating the national debt correctly and that it appeared to be $9 billion less than it is in fact. He also noted that the figures given by the Department of Finance at the end of August showed an accumulated deficit of about $86 billion. According to the figures of the Auditor General, the actual deficit would be $95 billion. He then stated:

From what I have been able to see, our assets should be reduced by about $2.4 billion and our debt increased by about $5.6 billion.

In view of the damning evidence given by the Auditor General, which can be upsetting for the Canadians who want to know about the financial situation of Canada, will the Minister of Finance review his figures? Will he check, reassess and correct them so that Canadians may know the real financial situation of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, despite my high regard for the newspaper profession, perhaps I would be better prepared to reply to the honourable senator's question had he commented directly from an official statement made by the Auditor General. What he has quoted from appears to be a newspaper report—a fragmentary account of remarks attributed to the Auditor General.

Senator Asselin: Do you deny it?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will give the commitment that the question will be taken as notice, and efforts will be made to obtain as much accurate information as possible.

● (1415)

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in view of the fact this is the second time in recent years that the Auditor General has found that the government has grossly overstated its assets, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he will consult with the Minister of Justice and the law officers of the Crown and advise us as to what penalties would be levelled against the directors of a company in the private sector for grossly overstating their assets and understating their liabilities for public consumption. Can he tell us whether such directors in the private sector would have to go to jail for such an offence?

Senator Perrault: I may be mistaken and it may be unfair of me to suggest this, but do I sense a political orientation to that question directed to this side by the official opposition?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Never from Senator Murray!

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): What was your statement when you were in office? Exactly the same!

THE CONSTITUTION

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Martial Asselin: On a different subject, I should also like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The minister who seems to be responsible for federal-provincial relations with Quebec, the Honourable Serge Joyal, announced yesterday with considerable emphasis that the federal government was ready to spend $2 million or more on advertising or propaganda in Quebec, to promote the new constitutional document that is to be tabled in Parliament this afternoon. Considering the appalling state of the economy in Quebec, at a time when we see large numbers of factories closing down and as many companies going bankrupt, would it not be preferable, for the time being, to spend this $2 million on the private sector in the form of grants to create jobs, instead of throwing this money out the window just to tell Quebecers that the federal government is right and the provincial government is wrong?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): First of all, honourable senators, with respect to assisting private enterprise and small businesses in this country, let me say that no government in the history of this nation has been more generous or more forthcoming in its investment policies. If the Honourable Senator Asselin commits himself to read to this chamber all of the grants which have been made to deserving companies in the province of Quebec to assist employment and economic growth, that list will be provided to him, but only on condition that he share that information and knowledge with every member of the chamber.

Secondly, with respect to the information program contemplated for the province of Quebec, we do not regard that as an expenditure but as an investment in public enlightenment for the benefit of Quebec and for the benefit of Canada and for national unity.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Surely Senator Asselin is not suggesting that what many Canadians consider to be the irresponsible and divisive accusations being made now by the Premier of Quebec and some of his colleagues, distributed, I understand, to every home in the province of Quebec and throughout the media, should go unanswered? Surely he is not suggesting that there should be no reply by the Government of Canada?

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Once again, the Leader of the Government has not answered my question. I asked him the question in view of the appalling state of the economy in Quebec. I could invite my colleague to come and visit Quebec if he really wants to see what the economic situation is like, when twenty service stations had to close recently because the owners could not meet their payments as a result of the high interest rates set by the federal government and the Bank of Canada. I therefore ask the Leader of the Government whether there is not a better case for investing this money to create jobs instead of wasting it on partisan advertising for the federal government.

[English]

Senator Perrault: First, we do not intend to cancel the program; and, secondly, one of the best ways in which to encourage economic expansion in the province of Quebec would be to re-establish the spirit of confidence in the economy of that province which many believe has been adversely affected by the present provincial government.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Well done.

● (1420)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Leader of the Government suggesting that by speaking in the manner in which he has just spoken he is helping the situation with regard to the resolution on the Constitution?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am suggesting that there comes a point in time when some facts must be placed on the table, because the future of this nation is of critical importance.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not believe that the timing of the Leader of the Government coincides with the timing indicated by Mr. Joyal yesterday.

THE BUDGET

CUTBACKS IN SOCIAL PROGRAMS—REACTION OF PROVINCES

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is prompted by his remarks to my colleague, Senator Asselin, about sharing enlightenment and knowledge. Were we now in the House of Commons together, as we once were, I would ask my question through the production of papers procedure, but in view of the fact that I am preparing a monumental speech under my inquiry in reference to what he called and I think it was a good term—the “social programs,” would the minister bring to the Senate documentation as to the reaction to the budget of the provincial ministers concerned with these social programs, which, I understand, is one of great dismay and concern over what will happen to these very important programs under the massive onslaught of the budget introduced the other night? Would the minister bring to this honourable house the documentation which will reveal the reaction of the provincial ministers concerned, from one end of this country to the other, so we can look at it and see how wrong he was when he suggested, I hope not seriously, that these programs were to be enhanced as a result of the budget introduced the other night?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am most pleased to reply to Senator Macquarrie's question but, first, I would like to make a general comment. Senator Macquarrie has served in Parliament with some distinction for many years, and I ask him if he can recall, in that long experience, one budget which elicited from the opposition one favourable comment, one budget which resulted in the heaping of praise upon the government, whether it was a Conservative government, a Liberal government or any other government. Of course, he cannot. Senator Macquarrie's question typifies the automatic reaction of some of those who serve in opposition—and they have an important responsibility in that role—to seek out weaknesses in any budget.

Honourable senators, despite all the dire predictions on the part of Senator Macquarrie, especially that the government would take a Draconian approach to post-secondary education and make a drastic cutback—

Hon. Martial Asselin: You said it.

Senator Perrault: —we were told the other evening—and the figures can be found in the budget papers—that support for higher education by this federal government, which, in fact, is very conscious of the need for a better educated population, will increase from $11 billion over a four-year period to almost $20 billion, which represents an increase of almost 13.5 per cent per year in each of those four years. This is what Senator Macquarrie talks about in terms of being “a drastic cutback” in federal support for post-secondary education. The charge has no basis in fact, and I think it most unworthy of the official opposition to continue its theme and continue its—

Hon. G. I. Smith: Oh, come off it!

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Perrault: —efforts, even through advertising campaigns in institutions of higher learning in this country, to strike fear into the hearts of the student body when they know the facts are contrary to their allegations.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, it is a new role for such a gentle old fellow as myself to become the Draco of this place. I submit to the minister, whose expostulations sometimes go a little beyond his information perhaps, that I am not concerned with wreaking havoc and sowing gloom and doom—

Senator Perrault: You give it a good try.

Senator Macquarrie: I am merely concerned about the provinces. It seems to me that all the provincial ministers concerned with these programs have been talking about nothing but this topic for the past few days, and if the minister can convince me that they are wrong, then I will help him convince the provincial ministers that they are wrong. But it would surprise me wonderfully if the ministers, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, have misread this budget so atrociously. I think the minister knows very well that assigned and definite contributions to specific pre-arranged programs have in fact been cut off, and the provinces have been thrown into the realm of equalization. I know exactly, and he should find out, what the provincial treasurers feel about this, and that is why I would like the information produced, and then we will argue about it in full.

● (1425)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we, on this side, are concerned with doing constructive things. Perhaps Senator Macquarrie may wish to write to the provincial treasurers and ask them what they think of the budget. Believe me, it is low on the priority list as far as some of us are concerned.

In my own province of British Columbia, for example, the budget has been criticized by the government of that province, saying that the federal government has not been generous enough toward this or that program, including higher education. Here is a province which hopes to be able quite easily to balance its budget this year. Indeed, the Minister of Finance of British Columbia stated the other day that he was delighted to be able to announce that there could be a fairly good surplus. Now we are being lectured by Senator Macquarrie who suggests that somehow these provincial governments are being starved and deprived by the federal government which had a deficit that it is urgently striving to reduce.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame.

Senator Perrault: Every sitting we are asked in this house to reduce the deficit; cut down spending here, there and everywhere, but as soon as the government attempts to do anything constructive or—

Senator Asselin: It's too late.

Senator Perrault: —as soon as an attempt is made to bring into balance the sharing of responsibility to provide services for the people of this country, be it VIA Rail or be it education or anything else, we are immediately attacked for being par-simonious—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We are taken by surprise.

Senator Perrault: —and attacked for being unfair. I know that Senator Macquarrie has a better developed sense of justice than to make an accusation of that kind—

Senator Flynn: Don't make us cry.

Senator Perrault: —that somehow the federal government is not being fair with the provinces.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, what I need at this moment is a well-developed sense of humour, and I hope I have it. I would like to say again that I am appealing for information on this, and I hope I did not hear correctly although I usually do hear correctly—I am not that decrepit—but do I get the impression that the last thing the government cares about is the views of the provincial governments on these matters?

Hon. Lowell Murray: That is what he said.

Senator Macquarrie: I would say that is a shocking decline from what the great Lester Pearson used to call “co-operative federalism.” There is no one in the country they should be listening to more attentively than those people who are involved in raising revenues and running programs for the education of the young and the health of the old in the provinces. They should have consulted with them beforehand and not be trying to bamboozle them now. I hope they will not try to bamboozle us, that they will produce the evidence, and we will see what the provincial treasurers think of the hocus-focus on this program.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators—

Senator Smith: A short answer!

Senator Perrault: —perhaps this may be my final word on this subject. Low on the list of priorities is the gathering of random opinions which appear in the media about the attitudes of provincial ministers of finance, but high on the list of priorities is the opportunity to sit down with these finance ministers and to negotiate new federal-provincial joint program agreements. That is why the federal government has taken the lead to obtain provincial views at this forthcoming finance ministers' conference. We will be pleased to meet with them on a rational basis, but if the honourable senator is suggesting that, across the many miles of Canada, we should be writing letters saying, “Tell us what you think of the budget,” then I will say that that is a very disorganized way to appraise the views of the provinces, and we do not intend to engage in that process.

Senator Smith: Very suitable to a disorganized government.

Senator Macquarrie: This will be my final comment as well. It probably would not hurt, although they would not like it, for the government to find out what the people of Canada think of this budget, and I do not think they will find that they like it very much. Meanwhile, it is better late than never to meet with these people. In the interim, please produce the evidence.

Senator Perrault: We will attempt to obtain an observer ticket for Senator Macquarrie so he can listen to every word.

Senator Flynn: That is not what he asked for. You can read it tomorrow.

REVISION OF EQUALIZATION SYSTEM

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Could the minister give the Senate some information on the changes in the equalization program? I understand that now the Ontario tax-raising capacity is a new benchmark or standard by which the equalization formula would be determined. Can the minister tell us what that means in terms of the six recipient provinces? Will their entitlements increase or decrease under the new system?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I believe it was clearly explained in the budget, but I will try to get a further explanation than that if my honourable friend needs it.

• (1430)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We do need it.

Senator Doody: At the same time, would the minister obtain some information on the components of the formula? I understand that the municipal taxing capacity will be included as the twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth component of the formula. Perhaps the minister could provide us with some information as to how that will affect the entitlement to the recipient provinces.

Senator Olson: I will also take that as notice.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the Leader of the Government explain his position respecting the complaint raised by my colleague, Senator Macquarrie, regarding assistance to the provinces which is in keeping with the line of questioning opened up by my honourable friend, Senator Doody? While it may be true that established programs financing appears to have emerged relatively unscathed, no mention was made of the fact that there has been a decided change in the net impact of the federal budget on provincial government revenues, because guarantees will be removed from the tax arrangements with the provincial governments.

One has to remember that however this government may regard established programs financing, those funds are used as block grants by the provincial governments and the guarantees that are already in the tax rental agreements are being used, as Mr. Breault's task force reported, for education and health.

If my honourable friend will refer to page 50 of Fiscal Arrangements in the Eighties—Proposals of the Government of Canada, he will see the point that my honourable friend, Senator Macquarrie, is trying to make—that there is a decline of $1.9 billion in the net impact on provincial revenues because of the changes proposed in this budget.

Even if the established programs financing funds remain relatively untouched, will my honourable friend explain for me, if he can, this $1.9 billion net reduction in the revenues accruing to the provinces over the five-year period in question? It seems to me that this completely bears out Senator Macquarrie's point.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice, and I will be prepared to make a statement on the subject.

Of course, Senator Roblin ignores the fact that if certain of the tax reforms and changes are followed by parallel provincial action, it would help to compensate for any lesser revenues.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend could not be more wrong in that statement because the facts are that the estimated savings by the federal government are $5.690 billion, and from that it deducts the estimated increase in provincial revenues which will arise from this very same budget.

The details of those items are to be found at page 50 of Fiscal Arrangements in the Eighties. For my honourable friend to suggest that the provinces will be able to make up on the roundabouts what they have lost on the ferris wheels is nonsense. His own budgetary document makes it perfectly clear that they are short by $1.9 billion over the period.

That is precisely the point which will bear on the question of education and health support, among other things, that the provinces have to finance. What good does it do the people of Canada to merely go through a bookkeeping shuffle by transferring a tax obligation or expenditure from one level of government to another?

It is all very well to talk about the Province of British Columbia, since it has a surplus and it can balance its budget. There are only three provinces in this country in that happy position, and the others have deficits. The deficit in the case of the Province of Quebec is even more daunting than the deficit budgeted for by my honourable friends.

Senator Perrault: As I stated, I would be pleased to bring a statement to this chamber on this particular subject. Again, I say that Senator Roblin is only giving a partial picture, and the full picture must be made known in order to judge this budget and some of the statements made in it.

We should remind ourselves that, when the Minister of Finance presented this budget, he talked in terms of equity and fairness, and there must be fairness in the relationship between provincial and federal governments. There has to be a fair sharing of responsibilities among municipal, provincial and federal governments in this country. That is how a country should be operated.

Senator Roblin: I must protest my honourable friend's ascribing to me a partial, inadequate or incomplete view of this matter. Perhaps it is, but all I can say is that, when I make this statement, I am reading from the document presented by the Minister of Finance himself.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): There are more documents you should read.

Senator Roblin: This table is headed: "Net Impact on Provincial and Territorial Revenues of Budget Tax Changes and Proposed Savings by the Federal Government." What could be clearer? If there is more to it than that, then let us hear it.

Senator Perrault: There is.

Senator Roblin: I am not trying to mislead this house by presenting incomplete or inadequate figures.

Senator Perrault: Never.

Senator Roblin: I am simply trying to bring to my honourable friend's attention something he should have found out for himself a long time ago, but obviously has not done so. We on this side of the chamber have been asked by some cabinet ministers whether we have ever read these documents. We certainly know something about them, which is more than some of the gentlemen opposite can say.

I am simply reporting to this house what the government itself says, and to call my presentation inaccurate or incomplete on that account is a comment which is not deserved under the circumstances.

Senator Perrault: I urge the honourable senator to absorb as much as possible of the information contained in the seven cabinet papers and documents.

The government and the Minister of Finance have been very forthcoming in providing information for honourable senators. Honourable senators opposite are making rather selective use of the material. Earlier today it was suggested that somehow the Minister of Finance had been citing incorrect figures. Now Senator Roblin is citing these figures as the absolute economic gospel. In the view of the opposition, are these figures accurate or inaccurate?

Hon. G. I. Smith: That is the gospel according to MacEachen.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend wants to go down that diversionary road, he may do so, but the facts and records are here and they cannot be altered.

When he talks about equity in the budget he tempts me to deal with the question of equity. I will restrain myself from launching into an exposition of some of those facts he ought to know which relate to the effect of marginal federal tax rates on individuals in this country. This was presented to the whole nation as being a move towards equity when, in fact, all it does is help people in the very high income tax brackets to a much greater extent than it helps anybody else. I know that some time later we will have a debate on this matter, so I will not pursue it at this time.

I think my honourable friend will agree that there is a lot of good material in this document if he will take the trouble to read it.

INCOME TAX ACT—NON-DEDUCTIBILITY OF INTEREST ON LOANS FOR INVESTMENT PURPOSES

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I am sure we would all like to read and absorb all the documents. If I were in the minister's position, I would not be very proud of a document on economic development that is already being described widely in the press and by unnamed officials of the government as "pap for the eighties."

That being the case, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether he has anything new to report with regard to the provision in the budget to abolish deductibility of interest on loans made for investment purposes. Last night the minister indicated that representations have been made to the Minister of Finance, and he said that, if those representations parallel what is outlined in the adjustments the Minister of Finance has already made with regard to MURBs for certain projects which are already under way, it may be that he will make some changes.

In view of the fact that this provision to abolish deductibility is having a counterproductive effect on the professed desire of the government to Canadianize industry; and in view of the fact that it is causing some trauma in the stock exchanges, particularly in the smaller regional stock exchanges, will the minister say whether the government has reached a conclusion on whether to withdraw or change this provision?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the statement made by the Minister of Finance yesterday dealt specifically with MURBs. In his statement he also indicated that there are probably a number of other transitional matters that should be dealt with.

An Hon. Senator: You can say that again.

Senator Olson: You can say that about every budget which seeks reform because, obviously, some transactions or projects are under way at the time the budget is presented. Therefore, the budget proposals require detailed study. The Minister of Finance is adopting a very responsible attitude in that he will have some discussions with the people directly involved in these matters. Certainly, this may not occur today or tomorrow, or even in a couple of weeks. When those budget papers, in fact, are introduced, he will have listened attentively to the representations and will introduce whatever amendments seem appropriate for the transitional period at that time.

● (1440)

Senator Murray: Specifically with regard to the question of deductibility of interest paid on loans made for investment purposes, am I correct in interpreting the minister's reply to mean that the government is now considering a revision of that measure?

Senator Olson: I do not want to repeat what I said a moment ago, but the honourable senator can take it that the Minister of Finance has received some representations on that point.

Senator Murray: And is now considering changes in that provision?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could go back to the speech I made a moment ago, however short, when I said—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is an admission.

Senator Olson: —that the honourable senator is aware that there are transitional problems from one tax regime to another and representations are being received. This government, in keeping with its traditional role of responding to reasoned representations, obviously is giving the matter some consideration.

INCOME TAX ACT—DISCONTINUANCE OF INCOME AVERAGING

Hon. Martial Asselin: Along the same line of thought, may I ask the minister whether the Minister of Finance will reconsider his decision to discontinue, as of now, the income-averaging tax deduction on payments made over a period of 15 years of which hockey players and artists could avail themselves? The minister ought to know that since the Minister of Finance announced that decision, the owners of professional hockey teams have raised objections and said that professional sports in Canada are quite simply being strangled because hockey players will join American teams instead of remaining in Canada as a result of last week's budget announcement that the deduction for payments made over a 15-year period is discontinued.

I should point out to the Leader of the Government the likely possibility that the Vancouver team, which happens to be a good one, may move to the United States. Vancouver would be left without a hockey team next year because the players see no point in being treated differently from their American colleagues. In my opinion, professional hockey in Canada is now a major job-creating concern. In light of the general outcry by hockey team owners and hockey players themselves, will the minister reconsider his decision?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the reply that I gave Senator Murray a few moments ago applies also to the honourable senator's question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We will be left only with the skaters on the government side.

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): While my honourable friend is advising the Minister of Finance on further flip-flops, I have another one that I would like him to take under consideration for me.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Rephrase it.

Senator Roblin: The minister wants me to rephrase it. I don't know whether I am prepared to do that, because "flip-flop" is such a descriptive phrase and so accurately describes what is taking place that one is pretty well compelled to adopt it. However, I am concerned about the Small Business Development Bond Program. The Minister has told us that this is a reform budget. It certainly is so far as the Small Business Development Bond Program is concerned. One might say that it has gutted—I believe that is the expression that has been used recently—the Small Business Development Bond Program, because while it is extended to unincorporated small businesses, which we requested during the last budget discussion—and I acknowledge that that is good thing—the trouble is that its application has been reduced; so instead of applying to companies that want to buy certain types of capital equipment to grow and expand—and, after all, small businesses have been the major force of our expansion during this last little while—it is now restricted to only those firms that are in financial difficulty. In other words, if one is about to go broke, one might get some of this money; but if one wants to do something productive and keep the economy expanding, it does not look as though one will get it.

Could my honourable friend explain why this reform from the previous arrangement, whereby this money could be spent for productive purposes, has now been restricted to take care only of those who are in financial difficulty?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my friend, Senator Roblin, will recall that the extension of the Small Business Development Bond Program announced last year was for one year. He knows that the budget announcement of November 12 extended the eligibility for people in distress. The Minister of Finance has taken the position—and I am sure the honourable senator will understand this—that this is a matter of some preferential treatment and, in some respects, a tax expenditure by the banks that extend these small business development bonds. The honourable senator is arguing that it should probably continue even beyond the announcement made a number of years ago with respect to the qualification and definition that was therein stated. I guess we have to balance the major thrusts of the budget in terms of equity for a whole lot of people involved, and that is probably the reason.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend not agree that when this small business development bond was introduced, interest rates were substantially lower than they are at the present time? Would he not consider that to be a true statement? When it was good last year, when interest rates were lower, to extend this privilege to small businesses in order to develop the economy, why is it no good today when interest rates are higher? It seems to me that, if anything, it should be retained until interest rates reach some more reasonable level. At that stage one could understand that a reasoned case could be made for eliminating it; but now, when interest rates are even higher than when this policy was introduced, it seems ironic that it has been reduced to such laughable proportions.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if there were unlimited amounts of money available to the government, including such things as tax expenditures that are involved in this, regarding the financing institutions that extend this small business development bond, I suppose one could agree with the validity of that argument. I am sure that my honourable friend would agree that the extension of the qualification to individuals and, indeed, to farmers who are in distress is perhaps the best use of that tax expenditure.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend would persist in his policy instead of losing heart, he would find that the increase it would add to our productive capacity, and therefore to tax revenues, would represent a very reasonable investment, in the circumstances.

Senator Olson: I understand that argument, and over time it is probably an interesting one; but the main thrust of the budget, as I explained several times yesterday—and I do not want to go over it again—is to reduce the federal deficit, thereby withdrawing the Minister of Finance, to that extent, from the market, in the hope that we will make our contribution towards getting interest rates down. If that happens, my honourable friend probably will agree with me and the Minister of Finance that that is one of the most important economic stimuli that could take place in this country.

Senator Roblin: I wish my honourable friend would read his documents, because if he will turn to page 8 of The Current Economic Situation and Prospects for the Canadian Economy in the Short and Medium Term, he will find the question of interest rates dealt with, and dealt with in spades. In that particular document, which is a document of the government, it makes it quite clear that it is the Bank of Canada which raised the interest rates in the last little while. I will read it to him:

Concerns about the increasing rate of inflation in 1981 prompted the Bank of Canada to respond to pressures on the Canada-United States dollar exchange rate resulting from the high interest rates in the United States by raising interest rates in Canada.

Which was precisely what I told my honourable friend last night. The document goes on to say:

The uncovered differential between short-term Canadian and American rates increased from substantially less than 1 per cent at the end of 1980 to over 2 per cent at the end of the second quarter of 1981.

It goes on to explain further why the interest rates situation is the way it is.

I am telling my honourable friend that unless he is willing to face up to the Bank of Canada's interest rate policy, he is not going to get the results he expects, even from a lower borrowing position of the federal administration.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend can read over and over again the assertion by the Minister of Finance that he supports the Bank of Canada in its monetary policy and, indeed, for the very reasons that the Bank of Canada has stated in following that policy.

Senator Roblin: Would the minister deny the truth of my statement?

Senator Olson: If the honourable senator has read a quotation from any of the budget papers, I would be the last one to deny the truth of what is contained therein.

Senator Roblin: Then you had better change your tune, because it knocks your argument into a cocked hat.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SLAVE INDIAN BAND—LOSS OF INTEREST ON NATURAL GAS ROYALTIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Williams on July 9, 1981, concerning the rates of interest for accounts held by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for members of the Fort Nelson band.

Under an agreement negotiated last year, the Fort Nelson band of British Columbia will continue to receive substantial moneys from oil and gas sales and royalties from the reserve. All such band funds fall within the scope of the Indian Act, and they are retained in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Interest is paid on these moneys according to a Treasury Board minute, as amended on January 29, 1981, P.C. 1981-3/255, "at the quarterly average of those market yields of the Government of Canada bond issues as published each Wednesday, by the Bank of Canada . . . which have terms to maturity of 10 years or over."

Honourable senators, at this point there follows a rather detailed amount of information of a technical nature on the subject. May I propose that this be incorporated as part of the record of today's proceedings? Honourable senators may then wish to comment after they have read the total reply.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The reply continues:)

This results in interest being calculated quarterly and credited semi-annually.

Over a period of years, and under normal conditions, this rate would be generally comparable to that obtainable in the private market. In the current highly fluctuating situation that prevails there, however, and in the short term, it may well result in a somewhat lower rate at any given time than that otherwise available.

Moneys held in the Consolidated Revenue Fund are available for the purposes set out in the Indian Act, but to obtain the higher rate of interest in the private sector, funds must generally "be tied up" for varying periods of time and would not, therefore, be available for use.

The study done by the band's management consulting firm, together with a request that the rate be revised, has been received, and the Minister of Indian Affairs has referred it to officers in our finance and professional services branch.

Although a full analysis of the study will take some time, it should be borne in mind that the interest rate comparison is weighted in the firm's favour since it sets present short-term rates against long-term ones. No mention is made that, for the period August 8, 1980, to January 6, 1981, the short-term rates paid by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce averaged 10.16 per cent while the average rate used by the department was 12.61 per cent, for a net difference in our favour of 2.45 per cent. While it is true that we are now paying a lower rate when compared to short-term rates available, a study performed by the Department of Finance indicates that, over the last three years, our rate of return has been more favourable.

If the financial institutions were convinced that the present trend would continue, it would be logical for them to increase the rate of return on long-term investments, and decrease it for short-term. The study's projections appear to be based on the continuation of abnormal economic conditions, without asking what happens the moment the long-term rate of return exceeds the short-term one.

The minister believes that all band councils should be made aware of the facts as they are, so that they may avoid placing themselves in a position of loss on their investments, once the economy returns to normal.

TRANSPORT

PORTS OF HALIFAX AND SAINT JOHN—LOSS OF BUSINESS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked on November 4 by Senator Smith concerning the ports of Halifax and Saint John. It is fairly long. Perhaps honourable senators would be willing to take it as having been read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators will know that the government is not generally aware of management strategies that may possibly be considered by private companies.

I am informed, however, that the president of Zim Israel Navigation Company, Mr. Rafael Kochav, has been reported as saying that the company has no immediate intentions of moving from Halifax to the Port of New York. As noted by the executive director of the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Commission, it is a healthy and normal practice for any company to look at proposals designed to improve operations. One would expect that a dynamic company such as Zim, which has been at the Port of Halifax for ten years, would continually be assessing their market strategies.

Honourable senators may wish to note that CN's rate increases have, in fact, been below the levels of inflation. The annual increase from January 1981 to January 1982—which includes a 2.3 per cent fuel surcharge implemented in August 1981—is 10.99 per cent for the movement of a 20-foot container from Halifax to Montreal. The increase for Montreal to Toronto has been 13.03 per cent for the same 20-foot unit.

I would also like to note that on Monday, November 16, the CTC resumed hearings in Halifax into the Dart acquisition. Although this forum could have served as an opportunity to register disapproval of freight rate increases, Zim Israel is not registered as an intervenor in the case.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 5, 1981, the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "Child at Risk," tabled in the Senate on October 16, 1980.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled Child at Risk, which I hold in my hand, makes, I believe, a most important contribution in an area of major and increasing importance to Canada and to many other nations. I refer, of course, to the wellbeing of the rising generation of Canadians and others.

Senator Bonnell, as chairman of the committee, and Senator McGrand, as the chairman of the subcommittee, deserve our thanks for what I think will prove to be a very important contribution to the literature in this field of social science.

The last speaker in the debate made some interesting comments on the report. Senator Bell made a general statement which I think we must consider carefully in deciding what our response is going to be, not only to this report but also to the many recommendations that are put before us from time to time by our committees.

The general statement to which I refer was as follows:

I am interested in what the Senate can do to implement those recommendations.

Then she added:

I have a few suggestions.

It seems to me that the suggestions that Senator Bell made with regard to our response to this report go to the very heart of a matter that must concern us all here, surely, from time to time, namely, what the Senate—not somebody else, but the Senate—will do to implement, or not to implement, a report of one of its committees. I say this because it seems to me that over the past few years, particularly, the area of Senate activity which has created the most favourable comment from the press and interested public is that of the initiatives taken in our committees and the work done by them.

Senator Bell, if I may paraphrase her various suggestions, seems to me to propose that we do something more than just receive this report and other reports, pay the usual compliments to the authors, and then allow such reports to gather dust on the shelves of the archives or libraries or wherever they may be, which is what has happened to the vast majority of parliamentary reports made to this and the other house.

Senator Bell makes the specific suggestion that we should have some methodology, some regular system, by which the recommendations of this committee would be applied when we are considering other acts that come before us, such as—and she names them—the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act, the National Housing Act, the Indian Act, the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Broadcasting Act, all of which this committee which has reported to us believes should be influenced, in connection with any future amendments made to them, by the recommendations of this committee.

I ask honourable senators this question: Do we really think that such amendments will be influenced in this way? Will we have such a system inaugurated here, in terms of which we will really pay attention to and give the respect that is due to such a report as this?

The final suggestion made by Senator Bell also goes to the heart of the matter. Senator Bell says:

—we should originate legislation in the Senate that does not call upon the public purse.

Again she cites specific acts which could be the subject of resolutions and amendments here, immediately following on this report. Again I ask, will that happen? It seems to me that these reports, and this report particularly, offer a tremendous opportunity to the Senate. I would agree that it is very much to our credit that in recent years we have outlived the description that we used to be so proud of, to the effect that we are "a chamber of sober second thought." I think what we have accomplished over the years is that we have become a place where new ideas originate, not merely where the ideas presented by other people are rehashed over and over again. I am not suggesting that we should suddenly become intoxicated with our own exuberance—far from it—but I do think the time has come for us seriously to consider accelerating the rate of initiative in the Senate in the matter of legislation and policy. I think this can be done.

The records are full of items which indicate that substantial changes in legislation and government policy have originated in the Senate; yet those same records give very scant credit to the Senate—only 25 or 30 in the last 20 years being recorded as Senate amendments to Commons bills.

I used the phrase "originated in the Senate". By that I mean that on-going practice, that very sound development, which we have evolved step by step over the years. One thinks immediately of what has come to be called "the Hayden Formula," by means of which Senator Hayden and the members of his committee have made it possible for the subject matter of bills introduced in the House of Commons to be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for pre-study. The committee has then called witnesses and has discussed the bills with those witnesses, with the result that the simultaneous debate going on in the other place has been improved greatly over and over again. I have heard the proceedings of that committee quoted in the other place.

The committee, of course, has gone beyond that, and has been able frequently to obtain commitments from ministers that certain amendments, or policy changes, would be made either at the report stage, at third reading, or at the first possible opportunity. I am thinking, for example, of the committee headed by Senator Croll which a good many years ago, at a most appropriate time in our social history, introduced the great improvement of the Income Supplement to the Old Age Pension. I think also of Senator Lamontagne's Science Policy Committee, which turned around our science policy, and whose recommendations are reflected in substantive changes in our legislation, including the creation, for the first time, of a secretaryship of state for science policy.

The same would apply to many other committees. For example, the National Finance Committee, of which Senator Everett is the chairman, in one report made 56 recommendations, if my memory serves me correctly. The minister came back before the committee and indicated that 54 of those recommendations would be accepted. There are many other examples of this sort of thing that will occur immediately to honourable senators who are familiar with the work of specific committees. I know that comparisons are not always the most useful exercise. However, I know that there are other such examples to be found in the work of Senator van Roggen's Foreign Affairs Committee, the Agriculture Committee, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, and the Transport and Communications Committee, of which Senator Smith is the chairman, which made over 100 amendments to a single bill.

Honourable senators, these are matters that should be brought to the attention of the Senate, of the media and of the public. If my recollection is correct, a few years ago a careful study was conducted. It began with the assertion, which may or may not be true, that in the last 10 years it is quite possible that more amendments to legislation originated in the Senate than in the House of Commons. I am not saying that that statement is true, but it is not far from the truth.

It seems to me that our timidity in the past has arisen from the attitude that we would not amend legislation because that would mean that it would have to go back to the House of Commons and we would then have to go through the whole business all over again. It has always been my feeling, honourable senators, that if we did that a few times, the Commons would get used to it and would welcome it. This is quite a different viewpoint from that which was expressed by the leadership in the Senate at one time—not the present leadership, I might add—which advised us not to send legislation back because, if we did, it would set off the NDP all over again on their theme of abolishing the Senate. I have not heard that attitude expressed lately, and I do not believe it is an attitude of the present leadership in the Senate.

How could we accelerate this Senate initiative? Senator Bell made some suggestions in that respect when she was referring to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. Perhaps I could add to her suggestions. She suggested that such a committee should list its priorities and should recommend to the Senate that the Senate should introduce an amendment or a resolution which would be sponsored, presumably, by the chairperson of the committee. Another suggestion would be that the government itself should take responsibility and say, "Because excellent work has been done in the committee, we will take the responsibility of seeing that it does not die, that it does not go on the shelf." The government would then examine the recommendations contained in these reports to see what the responsibility of the leadership of the Senate was. Leaving aside for the moment the fact that it is generally described as the leadership of the government in the Senate, it is also the leadership of the Senate for all of us, and I suggest that this is an activity that could well be a responsibility assumed at the level of the leadership in this chamber. That would certainly give us, as senators, the knowledge that serious consideration is being given to implementing the recommendations of these committees.

In any event, honourable senators, I feel certain that the climate and the spirit of innovation and improvisation which has characterized our chamber for a good many years will continue and become an increasing and invigorating aspect of the work of this honourable chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I did not intend to speak to this matter, but when I heard Senator Grosart putting forward these suggestions, I wanted to add one other. This procedure is actually in practice and is one which Senator Grosart overlooked.

The National Finance Committee, of which Senator Grosart is an active and important member, adopted the practice, when dealing with a certain report we had issued, of hauling the people from the department back six months later and asking them what they had done about our recommendations. They are aware that we are going to do this, so they consider the recommendations and either accept them or come back with reasons why they have not accepted them. I am simply saying that this is one method which has proved of value in the past.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this may not be directly in order, but I would like to express my thanks for the constructive intervention that Senator Grosart has just made, using this excellent report to illustrate the suggestions he has for the future conduct of the Senate, or at least beefing up some of the trends that the Senate has begun. I am sure that all other honourable senators share that reaction to his intervention.

I am not sure whether any other honourable senator wishes to speak on this inquiry, so in the meantime I will take the adjournment.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.:

That a special committee of the Senate, to be composed of seven members, be appointed to inquire into and report upon

(a) any matter relating to labour relations in Canada with particular reference to problems concerning the free collective bargaining process and the constructive settlement of disputes; and

(b) any proposals for a more orderly and less disruptive exercise of the right to strike.

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of the inquiry; and

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have discussed what I am about to suggest with the proposer of this inquiry, Senator Deschatelets, and with your permission I will ask that this order stand for a month.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN WITHDRAWN

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in view of the fact that we will probably have the text of a new resolution before us tomorrow, I would ask for the unanimous consent of honourable senators to discharge the house order agreed to on April 15, 1981, and to withdraw the motion for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen. Pursuant to rule 23, I ask leave to withdraw the motion of February 19, as amended, standing in my name:

That an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as you know, in order to withdraw this motion we must have the unanimous consent of the Senate. Is there unanimity?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

[Senator Frith.]

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE MEETING AT LENNOXVILLE, QUEBEC— AUTHORIZATION OF FUNDS

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture has set up a series of meetings to be held at various cities across the country. The first such meeting is scheduled for tomorrow. Through an oversight, authority was not obtained from the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to draw certain preliminary funds in order to finance this series of hearings. Since the first hearing is to begin tomorrow in Lennoxville, Quebec, it seemed to some of us who discussed this matter that the only way to handle it would be to have the chairman of the Agriculture Committee explain his predicament, if he wishes to add anything to what I have said. He can request of the Senate permission to draw down a certain amount, subject to eventual approval by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

● (1510)

So, I will call on Senator Hays to make that request and to add anything he wishes to what I have said.

Hon. Harry Hays: Thank you very much, Senator Frith.

Honourable senators, through an oversight on my part the committee neglected to obtain prior approval of its budget from the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. It is my hope that that committee will, when it meets tomorrow, approve the budget we will present to it, even though it will only have a short time to study the details of that budget.

The committee is scheduled to travel to Lennoxville, Quebec, tomorrow to hold a meeting. I would be quite upset, as I am sure the other members of the committee would be, if we were prevented from continuing on as arranged owing to this oversight on my part—and I do take full responsibility for it.

In order to overcome the problem facing us I would respectfully ask that the Senate approve today an advance of $3,230 to enable us to get our investigation under way as scheduled.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, under the circumstances the proposal seems reasonable. The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and the subcommittee will undoubtedly be proceeding to a consideration of the budget for this trip and, I understand, future trips that have been planned by the committee, and in view of that I think the committee should be allowed to go in peace to Lennoxville tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that I put the motion at this time?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Hays, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Godfrey:

That an amount of $3,230 be authorized as an advance to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture for its travel to Lennoxville, Quebec, subject to the presentation by the Chairman, of a supplementary budget, to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

TEXT OF RESOLUTION TO BE PRESENTED TO PARLIAMENT

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Frith, if the amended resolution on the Constitution is available sometime this afternoon, could it be distributed to us in our offices sometime during the day?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): In answer to another question, the Leader of the Government in the Senate made reference to that, and I understand that, unless the new resolution has already been tabled in the other place during our sitting, it will be tabled in the other place just before 6 o'clock. That being so, it is our intention, so I am advised by the leader, to give notice tomorrow for that resolution to appear on the order paper next week. Discussions will then take place with respect to how we will handle the debate itself.

If we follow that intended procedure, honourable senators will receive their copies of the new resolution sometime tomorrow, without any debate. They will have it when we table it, with copies for all senators. There will be no debate on the matter until the following week, and, in fact, we will be discussing with the other side what debate there will be even at that time.

Senator Deschatelets: If copies are available sometime today, even at 6 o'clock, let us say, would there be any objection to senators receiving copies in their offices tonight, even if it is as late as 7 o'clock?

Senator Frith: There would be no objection to that at all. I simply do not know that I can undertake to do the mechanics; but, if it is possible, you will have them. There is certainly no objection in principle. Honourable senators should have them as soon as we can distribute them.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Perhaps what I am about to ask is, in a way, a repeat of a question I asked earlier on the same subject, but as I understand it, as presented, the resolution will be in the form of suggesting an Address to Her Majesty with respect to some proposed changes in the Constitution of Canada. The question that concerns me is whether we will have an assurance that this new resolution to be presented to us will have been agreed upon by those who agreed to the "Accord." Will we know that this document exactly reflects the decision taken at the time of the "Accord" and any subsequent agreements? I believe it is most important that we know that and are not just presented with a document bearing no indication of its credibility.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I represented the Leader of the Government in the Senate yesterday at a meeting at which that subject arose, and on the basis of the discussions which took place yesterday I can say that the answer to the question is: Yes.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 19, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Canada Post Office for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 80(2) of the Post Office Act, Chapter P-14, R.S.C., 1970.

THE CONSTITUTION

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday next, November 25, 1981, I will move a motion respecting the Constitution of Canada.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Graham be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Lewis on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have prepared a motion for adjournment until Tuesday next, November 24, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening. However, it will have been noticed that the resolution respecting the constitutional proposals will be moved on Wednesday, November 25. It seems to me that it would be worthwhile our considering adjourning not until Tuesday, but until Wednesday. Therefore, I would ask you to allow me time in which to consult the committee chairmen, and later in the day I will request leave to revert to Notices of Motions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Later:]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to bring up a point that I have brought up in the past and that I shall continue to bring up. I do not see why, for instance, whether or not we sit on Tuesday evening should have any bearing on the commitments for committee meetings on Tuesday afternoon. I believe that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, of which I am a member, is meeting next Tuesday afternoon, and I am prepared to be present, but why should we drag in all other honourable senators who are not involved, simply because that particular committee, or any other committee, is meeting? We should get into the habit of having committee meetings, and not necessarily tie them in with sittings of the Senate, when all honourable senators have to be present. Why can't we just go ahead on Tuesday afternoon and have our committee meet, and not have the Senate sit on Tuesday evening and have all honourable senators dragged in for the benefit of a few?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree that the meetings of committees should not have any relationship to the sittings of the Senate, but I must say that my experience is that they do. Therefore, I intend to check with the chairmen, as a matter of courtesy at least, to see what meetings are planned and to ask each chairman what his reaction is. Apart from that, and in principle, I totally agree with Senator Godfrey.

Senator Godfrey: I have been hearing similar remarks for eight years, and yet we have never really tried it out, so how do we know that it has that much influence? The committee met on the Constitution week after week and had quorums, even though the Senate was not sitting. We have had numerous instances to prove that the Senate need not be sitting, but there is this tradition. Why don't we try it out next Tuesday afternoon and see how it works?

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—
TIMING OF DEBATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this is perhaps an extension of what the Deputy Leader of the Government has just said, and I hope I won't upset the apple cart. The Leader mentioned that he would be moving the resolutions on the Constitution next Wednesday.

He did not say that they were to be put on the Order Paper, but that the debate would start on that day.

I was wondering whether this was a formal decision, and whether the government will not consider the representations I made privately yesterday to the leader and the deputy leader, namely, that the debate here should not start before the other debate in the House of Commons has ended, unless of course it should last beyond a reasonable time in which case there might be an advantage. Logically, however, I do not think we should be asked to vote on a resolution until we know in what final form it will come to us once approved by the House of Commons.

● (1405)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is a possibility, of course, that next Wednesday action could be taken to stand the motion. The meetings being held in the other place at the present time are to discuss the length of the debate and its terms. As yet, that information has not been conveyed to me. I understand that discussions are continuing. However, it was felt important enough to have this motion on our order paper, and I would be pleased to meet with the Leader of the Opposition at some appropriate time—perhaps later in the day—when we have received more information from the other place, to determine precisely the type of schedule which may be agreed to by the other parties over there. Certainly, we should not rule out the possibility of at least accepting in part the proposal put forward by the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. Perhaps my question is premature, but was any decision made during the debate that individual amendments could be entertained rather than having global amendments presented by one side and then the other? Will he take this matter into consideration?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Deschatelets for his suggestion. One of the matters under discussion in the other place at the present time is whether the previous agreement as to the consolidation of proposed amendments from the various parties in omnibus form will be put in place, or whether individual amendments will be considered.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Senator Deschatelets is referring to the Senate, not the other place.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course we are free to establish our own practices here, but I think the procedures adopted in the other place, with the support of the leaders of the parties, should have some significance for supporters of those parties in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: They may have significance, but they are not binding.

Senator Perrault: Of course not.

Senator Flynn: I think the leader will agree with me that the order that was made with regard to the previous resolution does not apply to this one, and that the normal procedure would be for separate amendments.

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Flynn: It would be irregular to move a package of unrelated amendments.

● (1410)

THE BUDGET

MODIFICATION OF PROVISIONS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I invite the Leader of the Government, or the Minister of State for Economic Development, to explain to the Senate and to the country the reasons for the second flip-flop in budget policy announced yesterday by the Minister of Finance concerning the rules governing tax-free rollovers and share transactions in cases of corporate re-organization.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator can call it whatever he likes. This move was in keeping with what the Minister of Finance announced the day before. In that particular instance he dealt with changes to the MURB program and, in case there was any confusion, he made it very clear that it would be extended to the end of 1981.

His announcement yesterday, with respect to share transactions and the tax treatment that would be applied to them, dealt with those kinds of situations which any budget comes up against—that is, those matters that are already in place and which were put together on the basis of the regime prior to the budget.

The Minister of Finance has also stated that he will listen to representations concerning other matters covered by the budget.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should think so.

Senator Olson: He has indicated that, where justified, there would be provision for the transition.

Senator Roblin: It is a little late for that.

Senator Balfour: Would the honourable senator enlighten us in that regard and indicate, if he can, whether those additional measures under consideration include the non-deductibility of interest paid to earn investment income?

Senator Olson: I am sure some representations are being made in this regard. However, if I were the honourable senator opposite, I would not hold my breath while waiting for a decision. There were good and sufficient reasons for accelerating the decisions announced on MURBs and on the transfer of shares because they were, in fact, related to transactions that were under way. Consideration has been given to what has just been mentioned and, perhaps, some other anomalies will show up as a result of representations in the next few days.

I want my honourable friend to understand that all these changes in the budget are for the purpose of establishing a better base of equity in the taxation system.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That will be the main theme.

Senator Balfour: Along the lines just opened up by the honourable senator, would he enlighten those on this side of the house by telling us why the rules concerning tax-free rollovers and share exchanges on corporate re-organizations were appropriate for being put into place by the government of which he is a member, and why those reasons are no longer valid?

Senator Olson: That is the honourable senator's opinion.

Senator Roblin: It is obviously your opinion.

Senator Olson: It relates to equity, and the concept of people all across the country carrying their fair share of the tax burden. What the Minister of Finance has announced is what is, in his view and in the view of the government, a more equitable situation.

Senator Balfour: To put the question in very simple terms, would the honourable senator explain how the principles of equity have altered since the time the measures were put in place and the present time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and give a detailed answer.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, what is really frightening about this whole process, for anybody who cares about the Canadian economy, is the fact that the Minister of Finance has clearly brought in budgetary and economic policies not knowing what he was doing and not knowing what the consequences of his actions were going to be, and that he is getting advice from advisers who do not know what they are doing and do not understand the consequences of their actions on the Canadian economy.

Having said that, may I ask the minister to elaborate—

Senator Olson: Is that comment related to a question, or is it just thrown in? It is completely against the rules.

Senator Murray: It is a statement of fact.

Senator Frith: Free of charge and worth what we paid for it.

Senator Murray: It may be, as the minister says, completely against the rules, but it is completely in accord with the facts of the situation in this country today. The Minister of Finance did not know what he was doing.

Senator Olson: Your opinion is not necessarily fact.

Senator Murray: He is having to swallow his own budget piece by piece.

● (1415)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: I want to ask the minister if he will kindly elaborate on his statement that there are a number of other transitional matters that are being dealt with, so that we will know just what is the next morsel of his budget that is going to be swallowed by his colleague.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will bring in a statement, if I can get one from the Minister of Finance, of the number of people who are being affected by the changes in the tax regime. The Minister of Finance has stated—I don't know how many times I have to say this—that the government believes in equity and fair play.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: Keep saying it until it sinks in.

Senator Olson: It is not sinking in well, but perhaps after a while it will. I believe that the Minister of Finance has adopted a very proper attitude. He has received representations, and where there are transactions that are under way, or some investment and the possibility of loss, he will listen sympathetically to them and will respond by providing a transition period. If honourable senators opposite cannot understand that, then I may have to say it two or three times more today.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I don't think it will be very helpful.

Senator Balfour: Is the minister stating that what we received the other night was not a budget proposal at all, but something in the way of a white paper put forward for discussion purposes?

Senator Olson: Not at all. The simple answer is no. Perhaps the honourable senator can understand that. It might help toward his enlightenment if I point out that it is not a new practice to have some transition period with respect to certain things that I described a few moments ago.

Senator Murray: Why were they not in the budget?

Senator Olson: This government believes in listening to the people. The Tories opposite, when they brought in their budget, did not do much consultation and they were tossed out of office for it. So they really ought to understand that we on this side listen to the people.

Senator Flynn: You are not serious!

Senator Olson: That is exactly what happened.

Senator Flynn: Do you think this government would survive if it were not in a majority position? All those trained seals in the other place would vote for that budget, while they voted against ours, even though ours was much better.

Senator Olson: It was clear that the Conservatives had demonstrated an absolute inability to manage the house, even to the point of showing they could not count. If that is not a clear demonstration of mismanagement, I don't know what is.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Shocking!

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I wonder if he would agree with me that when a change is made to a budget by a Minister of Finance, the stance of the opposition would be better to congratulate that change and seek other changes rather than find carping fault with the minister, thereby causing him to protect himself in keeping the budget the way it is. It seems to me that the opposition—I don't know whether or not the minister would agree with me—is doing exactly the wrong thing and, in fact, is putting obstacles in the way of changing the budget to make it more workable.

Senator Olson: I agree, and the opposition is again demonstrating what they always do, namely, that they are not really concerned about the sincere representations that are made to the government when a new policy is announced.

Senator Perrault: They are playing nothing but politics over there.

Senator Flynn: He didn't give that advice to the government two years ago. He is on the side of the trained seals.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, would the minister consider printing a document for our consideration when the budget debate is concluded, or shall we have to add in the little bits and pieces ourselves?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators opposite have already demonstrated a reluctance to read carefully all the documents that have already been presented to them, and the Minister of Finance has said that he will listen to other representations. The minister has also said that by the time the budget papers—

● (1420)

Hon. Martial Asselin: Because it is a bad budget.

Senator Olson: —or “bad” budget bills are brought in, he will have considered any representations with regard to the transition period.

In reply to Senator Asselin—

Senator Asselin: It is a bad budget.

Senator Olson: —he wants to have captions for the budget, but I am sure that he will have to change them in the next few days.

Senator Roblin: If you make enough changes, I am sure he will.

Senator Asselin: How many changes are needed for the resignation of the minister?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for either the Leader of the Government or the Minister of State for Economic Development which deals with this very question. I do not think I would go as far as Senator Everett would like us to and congratulate the government on the changes, but in light of the fact that the government is taking into account certain changes, such as those to the MURB program and others, would either one or both of the ministers take to the government the concerns expressed over the inequities which arise through time differences? For example, while the forward averaging annuities are in effect wiped out for a young athlete who lives in the Maritimes, Quebec or Ontario, simply because of the time zones which cause the earlier closing of business in those provinces than in the western provinces, an athlete living in Vancouver has a decided advantage. I am sure that the Leader of the Government would not want people in his province to have an advantage over people in the other provinces.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the proposal advanced by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz will certainly be given attention by the government.

It has been rather interesting, honourable senators, to follow the discussions this afternoon. It seems that if the government refuses to change its position, it is described as hard-hearted and intransigent—

Senator Murray: Incompetent.

Senator Perrault: —but when it changes its position to meet a perceived need, the government has supposedly engaged in a flip-flop. So, obviously, there is very little the government can do to please the opposition.

Senator Asselin: We call it incompetence.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators can be reassured by the words of the Minister of Finance, who stated in the other place—

Hon. Jack Marshall: The Vancouver Canucks are okay.

Senator Perrault: —that he is considering further changes, modifications, alterations—

Senator Asselin: How many times?

Senator Perrault: —or fine-tuning in order to make this a budget that is truly responsive to the needs of the Canadian people. That is the kind of Minister of Finance we require at this time.

Honourable senators opposite seem to enjoy quoting from newspapers. Senator Guay has brought to my attention an article which appeared in the Financial Post. The very heart-warming headline is, “Federal budget called ‘reasonable for times’”.

Senator Marshall: Which budget?

Senator Perrault: The article goes on to say:

Despite widespread criticism, the federal budget is one of the better pieces of public policy Canada has seen for some time, says Stephen Browne, chief economist at Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada, Toronto.

“I think this is a pretty reasonable budget for the times,” he told a luncheon meeting of economists in Toronto.

The article continues:

John Grant, director and chief economist of Wood Gundy Ltd. of Toronto, told the meeting that Finance Minister Allan MacEachen has done the right thing in continuing a policy of restraint.

The article further states:

Mr. Browne agreed that fiscal measures in the budget could not have stopped the recession. “The irony for the minister is that he’s taking criticism for the things he did right.”

Despite the carping criticism of the Jeremiahs on the other side of the house, the Minister of Finance has shown that he has the courage and the fortitude to do the right thing.

Senator Asselin: What, back up?

THE CONSTITUTION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS CONCERNING CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State who, I think, has the responsibility for Indian and aboriginal affairs in this country, and perhaps many other things as well; I am not quite sure. Would the minister inform the Senate as to what concessions, either during or since the last meeting of the first ministers, the Prime Minister put before the first ministers of the provinces in order to obtain their agreement to the entrenchment of aboriginal rights in the accord which was reached at that time or in the draft text of the resolution which has been placed before us since that time?

● (1425)

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I think that the public record is very clear that the Prime Minister sought to maintain section 34 in the amendments to the Constitution proposed to be sent to Westminster, and that a substantial number of provinces would not permit section 34 to be retained.

Senator Smith: That is not quite the question, although I am sure the honourable gentleman would rather say what he did say than answer the question. I will repeat the question for his benefit, however, and see if he will deign to answer it. The question was: What concessions did the Prime Minister offer to the first ministers of the provinces in order to obtain their agreement to such entrenchment?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the only fit answer to that question is to be found in the notice of motion dated November 19 which is now before you.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, it sometimes becomes a little wearisome to listen to this sort of spineless declaration in answer to a question, and which avoids the question very nicely.

Just in order to remind the honourable gentleman of the attitude of the federal government, to which he now has the distinction to belong, I should like to point out that in the original resolution that was placed before the House of Commons, of which I have a copy here, there was a notable absence of any effort to do anything about the entrenchment of aboriginal rights, and if there had not been amendments recommended as a result of representations made to the joint committee studying it there would have been no such contents in the resolution which was placed before this house and the other house in April last.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I wonder at the ability of Senator Smith to skate on the thinnest possible ice.

Senator Smith surely knows that in the work of the joint committee to develop what became known as section 34, the government and the two opposition parties took positions on the text that were similar, but not on the preconditions. Senator Smith surely knows that the party to which he adheres took the position that no provision such as section 34 and others would be supported by the Conservative Party, except with the support of a substantial number of provinces. As we have not been able to obtain that substantial support, which includes the support of a number of provincial Progressive Conservative governments, I am amazed that he is on his feet asking that question of us.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, the honourable gentleman's capacity to be amazed rather than his capacity to answer a question with facts is really amazing to me, I having observed this facility of his now for quite some time.

I asked what concessions or persuasions the Prime Minister of Canada offered to the first ministers in order to obtain the agreement of the first ministers of the provinces. It is clear that there was none, and I say to him that it is clear also that the federal government never intended in the first place to have any such provisions in the Charter of Rights, or whatever they want to call this proposed resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen concerning the Constitution of Canada, bearing the name of the Prime Minister as the person who introduced that resolution in the House of Commons for the first time.

It is perfectly clear that there was no intention on the part of the federal government at that time to do anything about aboriginal rights.

Senator Austin: What is perfectly clear is that the Minister of Justice proposed section 34 at a time during the course of those discussions when the aboriginal peoples had been successful in making known their representations to the people of Canada, and at a time when the opposition parties would have been embarrassed to deny them that opportunity. But part of the hidden agenda of the Conservative Party was the veto of the provinces—

● (1430)

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Austin:—of this country, and I might add, for Senator Smith, that the successor government of his province, Nova Scotia, has, I understand, moved its position on the equality of women, from a denial to an affirmation, only under the greatest of pressure, and no doubt Senator Smith will be pleased to bring to the attention of Premier Buchanan and his government the need to make a similar shift on aboriginal rights.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Yes, get on the phone!

Senator Smith: Well, my honourable friend, to use his own words, continues to amaze me with his ingenuity in avoiding answering a simple question to which obviously the answer is "no." How he could consider it relevant to turn a question about aboriginal rights into a lecture on the status of women amazes me, too. However, it is perfectly clear that the honourable gentleman is not prepared to deny what I said, and said quite early in this discussion, to the effect that there was no intention on the part of the federal government to put anything in this resolution concerning aboriginal rights, because they did not have it in their first edition which was introduced in the House of Commons, and now it is still not there except in some very attenuated form, which is far from satisfactory and which, in fact, is extremely annoying, to put it mildly, to the aboriginal peoples.

Senator Austin: Senator Smith, with his long legislative experience, is a past master of the art of trying to turn white into black. The record is very clear that this government, through the Minister of Justice and the joint committee, proposed section 34, and the record is very, very clear that it was the provinces—eight of them, not including New Brunswick and Ontario, and with the possible exception of Quebec, as I said before, because I always want to be generous to Quebec—who placed before the Prime Minister on the morning of November 5 a document which was a proposed accord, on their part, that eliminated section 34. The Prime Minister asked them whether that was an oversight and they said, "No, it is not an oversight. This is our final position." The Prime Minister asked them to reinstate in the accord the provisions of section 36, which are now found in the document of November 19 before us, and they were prepared to meet without precondition in a first ministers' constitutional conference. Anything which Senator Smith, with his vast experience in practising obfuscation and obscurantism, can produce here will not get away from the real record of the event.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: My honourable friend has just added two very interesting words to describe his own conduct in this house ever since he became a minister—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It goes back further than that.

Senator Smith:—and I thank him for that, because they would not have occurred readily to me as suitable words to use. But whatever he may say, the fact is that in the first edition of the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons there was absolutely no reference to the question of aboriginal rights; but in the resolution which was amended by a great number of amendments and which was placed before the house in April of this year there was entrenchment. Now, when we look at the resolution which was introduced in the House yesterday, we find there is no entrenchment. That leads to my question, whatever the facts may be: What did the Prime Minister do to persuade the first ministers of the provinces to agree? He has now obviously said nothing, except to ask them if they would.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Smith is a lawyer, and so am I—

Senator Flynn: Are you a lawyer?

Senator Austin:—so perhaps I can say to him that we have joined issue on this matter and we will debate it again before the people of Canada.

Senator Flynn: I never realized you were a lawyer.

Senator Smith: I suppose, honourable senators, that is as good an answer as I will get out of the distinguished senator.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Question!

Senator Smith: Question? I have asked the question at least four times already. If the honourable gentleman has not heard it yet, that's because he is hard of hearing.

Hon. Lowell Murray: May I ask the Minister of State whether it is not a fact that in the original resolution the aboriginal rights referred to were to be defined at a meeting of first ministers? Therefore, how does the question of provincial veto arise?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I am not sure what "original resolution" means, but in the first document that was brought to this chamber as a proposed joint resolution there was no such provision as section 36; that was also put in during the course of the work of the joint committee. It is absolutely true that the Conservative Party never raised the question of including aboriginal rights at the time the document first appeared, but that the question of aboriginal rights being included flowed from the presentation of briefs by the aboriginal peoples.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It was not raised by your party.

Senator Austin: Of course it was. It was raised by the Minister of Justice after he had received the aboriginal peoples' briefs.

Senator Perrault: Absolutely.

Senator Asselin: No, it was raised by the N.D.P.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government on the same topic. I have not had a chance to refer to the original resolution, but having looked at the notice of motion laid before us today, and having compared that with the resolution introduced here in April, I have the overwhelming feeling that the Charter of Rights has, in effect, been emasculated and that the work done during the spring and summer by the special joint committee has to a large extent been nullified. I hope that in the course of the forthcoming debate the government will give us an explanation of that.

I would ask the Leader of the Government to undertake to determine why it was felt necessary to make a "notwithstanding" clause applicable to our fundamental rights. We have been talking so much about the equal rights of women and of the native peoples—both, of course, are extremely important—that I think we forget that this change strikes at the most fundamental rights we now have. In fact, it takes away rights. Why bother having a Charter of Rights at this point, I wonder.

I hope we will be furnished with a statement from the government with respect to the reasons why that was done.

I am also extremely concerned about section 33 and its application to all sections between 7 and 15. I do not know—and perhaps the Leader of the Government can tell me—why section 28 was left in, because at this point it really is meaningless. It was added to the April version of this document. I hope that during the course of the debate we will hear some explanation of the government's policy. In particular, I should like to have an explanation as to why it was felt a reference to Parliament had to be included in section 33, because when this resolution was presented to Parliament in April I think it was approved by all parties and a commitment was made to the people of Canada. In my opinion, Parliament is honour bound to stand by that commitment.

I can understand our difficulties with certain of the provinces—and I am glad to hear the news about the Province of Nova Scotia, and now we have to deal with Premier Blakeney and the Province of Saskatchewan—but that does not exempt the Parliament of Canada from the commitment it made earlier this year with respect to this Charter, and I hope that our leader, Senator Perrault, on behalf of the government, will be able to explain these changes.

I conclude by saying that I only raise these matters for purposes of clarification.

Senator Perrault: Senator Neiman has asked a number of important questions which will be taken as notice. Perhaps those questions will be answered in more detailed form during the course of the debate which may commence next week. This is a matter which, of course, will be discussed thoroughly with the Leader of the Opposition, but I would like to make a brief statement with respect to the Charter of Rights. Perhaps this statement will serve to allay some of the concerns expressed by Senator Neiman and felt by certain other members of this chamber.

It is important at the outset to understand that the entire Charter of Rights will be entrenched in the Constitution, and that no province will be able to opt out of any provision of the Charter. The agreement signed by the Prime Minister and nine premiers does not, in the view of the government, emasculate the Charter at all. Democratic rights, fundamental freedoms, mobility rights, legal rights, equality rights and language rights are all enshrined in the Constitution—

Senator Asselin: And women's rights?

Senator Perrault: —and apply across the country in all its areas.

What the premiers and the Prime Minister have agreed to could be described as a safety valve, which is unlikely ever to be used, except in non-controversial circumstances, by Parliament or legislatures to override certain sections of the Charter. The purpose of an override clause is to provide the flexibility that is required to ensure that legislatures rather than judges have the final say on important matters of public policy.

[Senator Neiman.]

The override clause of the Charter of Rights will require that a law state specifically that part or all of it applies, notwithstanding a particular section of the Charter. Such a law automatically expires after five years, unless specifically reviewed by a legislature. The effects of this provision are, first, that it will be politically difficult for any government, without very good reason, to introduce a measure which applies notwithstanding the Charter of Rights; second, a sunset provision of five years provides a degree of control over the use of an override clause and allows public debate on the desirability of continuing the derogation further.

It is important to remember that the concept of an override clause is not new in Canada. Experience has demonstrated that such a clause is rarely used and, when used, is usually non-controversial.

The Alberta Bill of Rights was enacted in 1972 and includes an override clause. The Saskatchewan Human Rights Code of 1979 also has an override provision. Neither has ever been used. The Canadian Bill of Rights, enacted in 1960 by the late Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, also contains an override provision, which should provide encouragement to the Conservative members of both chambers of Parliament. In 20 years, the only time it has ever been used was in the Public Order (Temporary Measures), Act enacted in November 1970, after the October crisis of that year. The regulations under that act which derogated from the Canadian Bill of Rights, however, expired less than six months later on April 30, 1971.

The Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms, adopted in 1975, contains an override clause which has been used several times. However, its use has been non-controversial and is instructive in looking at how the override clause may be applied in terms of the new constitutional Charter.

For example, despite the provision in the Quebec Charter guaranteeing that everyone is equal before the law, the Juries Act states that a lawyer cannot be a member of a jury. Despite the guarantee of open trials in the Quebec Charter, the Youth Protection Act provides for circumstances where a juvenile court may hold closed sessions. Despite the protection in the Quebec Charter for the privileged doctor-patient relationship, the Highway Safety Act requires a doctor to inform the licence bureau of the name of a patient who is medically incapable of driving a motor vehicle. These examples demonstrate the utility of an override clause where strict application of a Charter would otherwise lead to absurd results.

What is interesting, as well, in the Quebec experience, is that the first draft of Bill 101 would have made its provisions applicable notwithstanding the Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In this controversial area, public pressure forced the Quebec government to delete the clause from the bill.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Keep some of that for your speech.

Senator Perrault: It is because of the history of the use of the override clause and because of the need for a safety valve to correct absurd situations without going through the difficulty of obtaining constitutional amendments that three leading civil libertarians have welcomed its inclusion in the Charter of Rights.

Alan Borovoy, general counsel to the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, was quoted in the Montreal Gazette of November 7 as saying, "Our reaction is one of great relief. They did not emasculate the Charter." He went on to say:

The process is a rather ingenious marriage of a bill of rights notion and a parliamentary democracy.

Senator Flynn: I rise on a point of order. I realize that the Leader of the Government is prompted by the speech made by Senator Neiman, but that is not sufficient reason for making a speech before the debate begins. A question is a question, and a speech is a speech. I think we have had enough of this.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): You do not know the difference on that side.

Senator Flynn: We certainly do. You do not, because you only make speeches.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it may well be that the Leader of the Opposition is rushing to a more important appointment.

Senator Flynn: It is certainly something more important than listening to you.

Senator Perrault: I ask this indulgence of honourable senators. I have left approximately one-half page of this rather important explanation of the Charter of Rights, so I will carry on. Mr. Borovoy was quoted as saying:

The process is a rather ingenious marriage of a bill of rights notion and a parliamentary democracy. The result is a strong Charter with an escape valve for the legislatures. The "notwithstanding" clause will be a red flag for opposition parties and the press. That will make it politically difficult for a government to override the Charter. Political difficulty is a reasonable safeguard for the Charter.

Gordon Fairweather, who was an outstanding Progressive Conservative member of Parliament and now the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, is quoted as saying "I'm in no mood for nitpicking today. I'm feeling tremendously upbeat." That quote appeared in the Montreal Gazette of November 7, 1981. Mr. Fairweather said that the override clause will become as dead from lack of use as a clause in the British North America Act that, at least in theory, still enables Ottawa to disallow provincial legislation. Referring to long-standing provincial opposition to entrenched rights, Mr. Fairweather said, "The gang of 'no' has become the gang of 'yes'."

Professor Walter Tarnopolsky is a past president of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association and an international expert on bills of rights. His view is that the override clause is "really not such a bad idea and could have a great many advantages."

It should be clear, in conclusion, that the compromise reached by the Prime Minister with the nine premiers maintains the principle of a full, complete and effective constitutional Charter of Rights. It does not exclude rights which had previously been guaranteed. In fact, the Charter has been improved because unforeseen situations will be able to be corrected without the need to seek constitutional amendments.

Honourable senators, I hope to provide a more extended explanation during the course of my speech.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Will the honourable leader repeat the answer?

Senator Neiman: I have a supplementary question. I wonder, then, if the Leader of the Government would be able to clarify part of the statement which he just made with respect to the use by the Parliament of Canada of an excepting clause. The statement he gave us was that there had been no other exceptions made. I remind him of a provision of the Canadian Human Rights Act, a section of which I looked at less than an hour ago, which specifically exempts the provisions of the Indian Act. Senator Austin, this is for your information as well. This, to me, is a classic example of our accepting something that was then, and is now, very controversial.

I would ask the Leader of the Government to consider, since the Canadian Human Rights Act was enacted in 1977, whether it will be subject to the sunset clause immediately, if this present legislation is approved, or whether the application of the sunset provision to legislation that contains such a non obstante clause will only date from the time such legislation is enacted.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have some notes here but I will take the question as notice this time.

● (1450)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is he prepared to refer Senator Neiman to a speech I delivered in the Senate on January 23, 1979, and another on March 11, 1981, in which I advocated a "notwithstanding" clause as a reasonable compromise and which set out the same arguments as we have heard from the leader today?

Senator Flynn: I think you will have an opportunity to continue the debate, but to show you what a question is, as distinct from a speech, I am going to ask the Leader of the Government this question: Since the accord signed on November 5 provided that the Government of Manitoba was accepting section 23, subject to the approval of the legislative assembly of Manitoba, and since in the accord this opting out or reserve of the government is not mentioned, has there been any agreement with either the outgoing government or the incoming government not to provide for that reserve in the accord? That is a question of fact.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, my understanding is that the premier-elect of Manitoba, Mr. Pawley, will be in communication with the Right Honourable the Prime Minister sometime today to discuss the position of the incoming government of that province.

Senator Flynn: But why was it not mentioned? Did you assume that it did not mean a thing, or what?

Senator Perrault: Well, I hope the Leader of the Opposition is not suggesting that the overwhelming defeat of the Conservative Government of Manitoba is a reason to halt all action on constitutional proposals.

Senator Asselin: What about your party?

Senator Perrault: We believe that the new Premier of Manitoba is a reasonable person, and it is heartwarming to discover that he supports the idea of a Charter of Rights.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government does not understand my question. The accord mentioned that reserve. I am asking you why it is not there. Do you know? If you do not know, just say, "No. I will inquire."

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice, but the question is really academic now that Mr. Lyon is Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Unless you have had the agreement of the premier-elect that would justify the non-inclusion of that clause.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition must be aware of the fact that the new premier is presently engaged in discussions with the Prime Minister on this and allied matters. The new premier may have a different attitude with respect to—

Senator Flynn: That is not my question.

Senator Perrault: —the marginal notation entered on that original document of agreement by the Attorney General of Manitoba.

Senator Flynn: I am asking you why it is not there.

Senator Perrault: We may know soon.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. I had always been under the impression that the fundamental freedoms, as outlined in Part I, section 2, came under federal jurisdiction because a series of Supreme Court decisions had given paramountcy to the federal government. Our committee understood, that when we entrench this will continue to apply.

Why does the change in the resolution before us today not only not entrench those rights so that they cannot be changed by any legislature, but allows them to be changed by any one of the provincial legislatures as well as Parliament? I would be very grateful for an explanation of that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. There will be a detailed discussion of all of the provisions in this set of constitutional proposals within a few days. I can say that there is some disappointment on the part of the government that the Charter of Rights, which most Canadians felt to be a splendid document, has not emerged in its original form, but of course the leader of the Conservative Party and the leader of the N.D.P. insisted that there be an agreement with the provinces, and in the process of obtaining that agreement certain sections had to be modified in order to meet the requests of the Conservative premiers, primarily, in the provinces.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Is it not true that the Prime Minister, in order to get a consensus from nine provinces, threw overboard native rights and women's rights? Is it not true that such was the price to be paid for securing the support of the nine provinces?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I express the personal hope, and I think the hope felt by many of those who serve in Parliament, that before the debate has come to a conclusion we will have again restored those sections with respect to women's rights and native rights which will provide assurances to both of those groups that Parliament is very concerned about their protection and welfare.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to the question asked by Senator Neiman. It relates primarily to the long and involved answer that the Leader of the Government gave. If the override clause—the "notwithstanding" clause—is so innocuous and so non-controversial and it appears that it will never be used and so on, why did it take so long for the Government of Canada to agree to the inclusion of such an override clause? There was a time when it appeared as though the whole heart and soul of the Charter would be ripped out if such a clause were inserted, and now, suddenly, it appears that it is not a very important clause at all. Could the Leader of the Government give us an explanation?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, again this is a further demonstration of the desire of this government to develop a spirit of co-operative federalism from coast to coast in this country. From the outset, the government stated—and, of course, these statements were not believed by the opposition—that we would be responsible and flexible, and that we would like to sit down with the provinces and work out an accommodation. That has been done. I find it remarkable that some honourable senators seem to resent the fact that an agreement was reached. The achievement of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in working out this agreement will stand to his credit for all time.

Senator Flynn: Or otherwise.

Senator Perrault: The official opposition should really rejoice instead of sulking because of certain of these achievements.

Senator Asselin: We will not rejoice as long as Quebec is not part of the agreement.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, my question is not aimed at criticism of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in coming to an agreement on the override clause, which apparently is of no importance. My question is as to why there was such hesitation and delay and so much reluctance in conceding that point over the past year.

Senator Perrault: In the process of achieving an agreement, the federal government gave up certain of its positions, as did the provinces. Isn't it remarkable, honourable senators, that nine of the ten provinces—and, hopefully, all ten—will shortly agree that we want to patriate the Constitution and—

Senator Asselin: We cannot do it without Quebec.

Senator Perrault: —that we want the ability to amend that Constitution here in Canada, and that together with that agreement we are providing a Charter of Rights for Canadians?

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

REQUESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF INDUSTRIAL LABOUR AND MARKET INSTITUTE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers to give on behalf of the Minister of State for Economic Development. The first response deals with a question raised on November 10 by Senator Smith which concerned the Industrial Labour and Market Institute.

A recommendation to establish an Industrial Labour and Market Institute was presented to the federal government by the Canadian Labour Congress and the Business Council on National Issues. I am informed that my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, has agreed in principle with the provision of federal funds for this institute.

The Canadian Labour Congress and the Business Council on National Issues have been asked by the minister to submit a detailed proposal for further consideration. It is my understanding that the CLC and the BCNI are expected to submit this proposal to the Minister of Employment and Immigration early next month.

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—NATURAL GAS BANK

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second question was asked on October 29 by Senator Roblin concerning the Natural Gas Bank.

As honourable senators know the Natural Gas Bank is one of the initiatives of the federal government's National Energy Program. The concept was developed at a time when it appeared that a large number of Canadian companies were experiencing cash-flow problems due to shut-in gas and they would require financial assistance for their exploration activities.

● (1500)

I am informed that Canadian-owned companies within the industry are presently in the process of being polled to obtain an estimate of shut-in gas and to ascertain if, in fact, a cash-flow problem exists. The results of this questionnaire are expected in the near future and will be carefully studied before a final decision is taken as to what policy directions will be pursued in relation to a Natural Gas Bank.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

MINISTER'S ANNOUNCEMENT RE IMMIGRATION QUOTAS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Muir on November 4 regarding percentages of refugees from Indochina accepted by Sweden, Norway, Denmark and the Soviet Union.

According to the United Nations, 660,667 refugees from Indochina, including both boat people and those who fled overland to Thailand, have been re-settled in third countries. As of the end of July, 1981, Sweden and Denmark had each admitted 0.3 per cent of refugees from Indochina, and some 0.4 per cent had re-settled in Norway. These percentages were provided by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. According to the UNHCR, no refugees from Indochina were re-settled in the Soviet Union. Canada admitted 11.3 per cent of the Indochinese refugees. Therefore, Canada's performance in relation to these other nations is truly remarkable and commendable.

Honourable senators, in response to a supplementary question asked by Senator Godfrey regarding the Indochinese Family Reunification Program, in March, 1979 an agreement was reached with the Socialist Republic of Vietnam to begin the processing of applicants in Vietnam for whom an application had been made in Canada by a close relative. As of November 10, 1981, 3,329 persons had been interviewed, which resulted in the issuance of 2,360 immigrant visas. To date, 1,740 persons have arrived in Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I explained before, I tried to get in touch with the committee chairmen and was told that three meetings were scheduled for next Tuesday, namely the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages and the Sub-Committee of External Affairs on National Defence. I consulted the three chairmen, who assured me that the committee meetings would take place as scheduled, regardless of the fact that it appears to be the wish of the senators that the Senate adjourn until next Wednesday instead of next Tuesday. Therefore, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until next Wednesday, November 25, 1981, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators? [English]

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—
DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled: "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have discussed the matter with the originator of the motion, Senator Bonnell, who told me that he wanted to close the debate. I merely wish to point out to the senators that if anyone would like to speak to this question on the Order Paper before Senator Bonnell closes the debate, the senator in question should so advise Senator Bonnell. Meanwhile, I move on behalf of Senator Bonnell that this debate be adjourned.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

INVITATION TO MEET WITH MEMBERS OF LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF THE NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before calling Inquiries, may Senator Adams be allowed to make an announcement concerning a meeting this afternoon?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I have arranged to meet with members of the Legislative Council of the Northwest Territories in Room 356-S this afternoon. Although an agenda has not been prepared, honourable senators are invited to listen to and discuss matters raised by the representatives of that assembly. I would point out that equipment is in place for simultaneous translation from the Inuit language. Therefore, to those honourable senators who do not have travel arrangements in place and need not leave by four o'clock, I would extend an invitation to attend this meeting in Room 356-S.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, November 25, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 25, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGES IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with changes in the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with a change in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.

(For text of message, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled:

Statement related to the addition of raccoon dogs to the Import Control List, issued by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, pursuant to section 5(c) of the Export and Import Permits Act, Chapter 29 (2nd Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

Instrument of Exchange of ratifications between Canada and the United States to submit to binding dispute settlement the delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Maine.

Agreement between Canada and the United States on Social Security, signed at Ottawa, March 11, 1981, together with Order in Council P.C. 1981-3206, dated November 12, 1981, approving same.

Report of the Board of Trustees of the Queen Elizabeth II Canadian Fund to Aid in Research on the Diseases of Children, including the Auditor General's Report on the financial statements of the Board, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 15 of the Queen Elizabeth II Canadian Research Fund Act, Chapter Q-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Department of Public Works for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 34 of the Public Works Act, Chapter P-38, R.S.C., 1970.

He said: The item regarding raccoon dogs will perhaps be of interest to Senator Bird.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present, on behalf of Senator Everett, the report of the Standing Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (C), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of today and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of Report see Appendix p. 3063.)

Senator Leblanc moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Tuesday, December 1, 1981.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, has been detained in the west on public business. He is on his way back to Ottawa and will be present in the chamber later this afternoon. I should add that both Senator Perrault and I have a meeting to attend at 3.45 this afternoon regarding the constitutional debate. He will probably be joining me directly at that meeting. In the meantime Senator Langlois will be acting as deputy government leader and Senator Olson will be here throughout that period as well.

Hon. C. William Doody: Thank heaven!

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I direct the following question to Senator

Frith: In view of what he has just announced, am I to understand that the Leader of the Government will not introduce the constitutional resolution this afternoon? I suppose in that case it will be postponed until tomorrow, but I would like to know whether the Leader of the Government would prefer the debate to start tomorrow rather than after the House of Commons has voted on the same resolution.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition is right. That is, with respect to the first point, we did not intend to start the debate today, although the resolution is on the Order Paper for today. Regarding the second point, my reply is no, no final decision has been made, and we are going to discuss this with the Leader of the Opposition after the meeting.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

INTENTIONS OF GOVERNMENT RE 1980 POVERTY LINE UPDATE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government that has to do with the report of the Ontario Council on the Status of Women, which relates some pretty depressing statistics on the deplorable circumstances of aged single women in Canada.

As a follow-up to a question I asked last week, and without going into too many details, can the deputy leader say whether the government is considering the provision of relief in view of the fact that some of these single senior citizens are far below the poverty line, and not just below it? This is a situation involving many people, and I think it should be treated as an emergency. Would the deputy leader obtain information as to the government's plans in terms of changing pension plans and the like?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as to obtaining information, I will see that the question is passed on to the appropriate authorities. As to whether the government is considering relief of any kind at the present time, it may be that Senator Olson wishes to make some comment.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will take the question as notice, honourable senators.

Senator Marshall: Perhaps I may ask a supplementary question. I understand the Prime Minister told a national pensions conference just a few months ago that the government would be acting quickly to adjust pensions in order to bring the incomes of such people as the handicapped up to a decent standard. Could an answer to that question also be given at the same time? I am concerned about the immediacy of the need to reform pensions and to provide these people with a reasonable scale of living.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Olson: As I indicated a minute ago, I will take the question as notice. I will obtain a reply as quickly as possible, and include in it answers to the questions raised in the senator's last comments.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

INQUIRY RE INTRODUCTION OF PROPOSED AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Can the minister bring us up to date on the current status of the Foreign Investment Review Agency? There seems to be some confusion because of conflicting, or what appear to be conflicting, policy swings respecting that particular agency. In recent Throne Speeches there were some promises to expand and strengthen FIRA. It was also promised that FIRA's mandate would be broadened, and that caused considerable concern in many areas.

However, I now understand from the recent budget that no legislative action is contemplated to modify the Foreign Investment Review Act. Nevertheless, I would like to know exactly where FIRA stands in the Canadian economic scheme right now.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I doubt that I could give my friend better advice, or, indeed, better information, than to ask him to read the economic development strategy paper that was tabled along with the budget. That excellent document sets out the answer to what the honourable senator is asking in clear, unequivocal terms, and my honourable friend would have the benefit of being able to go back and read it four or five times. I am sure that if he were to follow my advice he would understand the matter.

● (1410)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): How many times did you read it yourself?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, are we to assume, then, that the philosophy outlined in the budget is the current government thinking—that is to say, that the pressure groups in the United States have won and the economic nationalists have lost?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it does not say that in the papers which were filed. The honourable senator may put whatever distorted and contorted interpretation on those papers he likes, but the words in that document say what they mean and mean what they say.

Senator Doody: I have a final supplementary question. If the minister is serious in saying that I am allowed to put any interpretation on the document I wish, I would like to go on record now as saying that I would ban FIRA from the Canadian legislation books, now and forever, because it has been a detriment to the progress of this country for far too long. However, I am certainly encouraged to see that common sense has prevailed and that the minister has won his wrestling match.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as I have said, this is a free country, whose citizens enjoy freedom of speech, and the senator is free to express his interpretation of the document. But I also reserve that right, and I am sure the senator respects my right, to disagree completely with his interpretation. Going back to what I said a moment ago, the paper says what it means and means what it says.

Senator Doody: I do not understand the minister's reservations.

THE BUDGET

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I am happy to relate this question to his earlier reply. The Toronto Star dismissed the economic development strategy tabled with the budget as a "second rate piece of work that could have been written by a handful of college students on a long weekend."

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is what happened.

Senator Phillips: Did the ministerial team which produced the economic strategy take longer than one weekend to develop it?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it took much longer than one weekend to develop the strategy, and despite whatever flippant comments the Toronto Star or anybody else wishes to make about that document, the fact is that while it may not include many new, sensational policies—though, indeed, it does state some that have not been stated before—it brings together into one, what I would call, brief document a number of priorities which have been pursued by several ministers, including the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Science and Technology and several others. It seems to me that it is useful to have all this information in one brief document which states the priorities and objectives of the government that are in keeping with what we regard as high potential for the Canadian economy.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the minister, but first I would remind him that the Star, the voice of Liberalism in this country, stated that the economic strategy policy was a sad commentary on the cabinet. In view of the fact that the 1980 budget anticipated an expenditure of $7.15 billion on economic development in 1981-82, as compared with $6.75 billion offered in the November budget, would the minister attempt to increase the amount of money allocated for economic development in order to develop a specific economic policy, and would he give us some details of that policy?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I agree with the first part of my honourable friend's preamble when he said that the commentary is sad. I agree with him, that it is a sad commentary, a sad way of reaching a consensus or a conclusion on the facts that have been laid before us. However, several days ago—I believe it was on November 17—Senator Murray asked essentially the same question. When we come to the point in the proceedings when Delayed Answers are called, I shall make a somewhat more detailed reply to that question which, I believe, also answers the question just raised by Senator Phillips. If honourable senators opposite would like to hear the delayed answer now, I would be glad to read it now.

● (1415)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We would like to hear it now.

Senator Phillips: As a supplementary, I would ask the honourable gentleman if he would be kind enough to provide the chamber with a list of plant closings and reductions in employment in various plants across Canada since the introduction of the budget.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure that that list is available. The government is making a great effort to ameliorate any difficulties and hardships which may have arisen. Indeed, it has set out an economic strategy so that, in the future, the economic activity in this country will, indeed, tax our capability to provide the financial and human resources necessary so that the economy may progress at its potential rate.

The Honourable Leader of the Opposition has suggested that I read the response I have to the question asked by Senator Murray. The question was as follows:

May I then ask the Minister of State for Economic Development why it is that the Minister of Finance announced that some $400 million less will be spent this year on economic development than had been projected—

And I would stress those words.

—than had been projected in his 1980 budget.

I replied that I would bring in a more complete compilation of what was put in the projection of the budget for last year and for this year.

I have reviewed the relationship between the Economic Development Envelope projections of planned expenditures contained in the 1980 budget and those given in the 1981 budget and have confirmed that Senator Murray's calculations with respect to reductions in the envelope are invalid. There has not been a reduction of $400 million, as he alleged on November 17.

In addition to its principal functions in providing resources for economic development activities, the Economic Development Envelope was assigned accounting and control responsibility for parts of the Western Development Fund, as the Minister of Finance explained in both budget presentations.

There has been no reduction in the funds provided for economic development. As I reported to honourable senators in March in connection with the differences between the 1980 budget and the 1981-82 main estimates, the differences are matters of accounting practice and display rather than of content. The 1981-82 main estimates and the new 1981 budget include the effects of repayments by crown corporations and others amounting to $205 million in 1981-82 and $211 million in 1982-83 not offset by new loans. The 1980 budget showed the gross amounts of loans made and the envelope levels were therefore higher by these amounts. In other words, the apparent reduction does not represent a reduction in overall spending, but simply an accounting transaction which offsets a portion of the gross expenditures within the envelope by crediting revenues arising from loan repayments. Taking into account this change in display, provision for economic development increased from $6.6 billion to $6.619 billion in 1981-82, and from $7.157 billion to $7.377 billion in 1982-83 between the two budgets.

With respect to the Western Development Fund, the Minister of Finance stated in the other place on November 12 that planned expenditures from the fund had been re-profiled as a consequence of the larger sums flowing to the provinces through the conclusion of energy agreements. Allocations from the fund have been made for western transportation initiatives in coming years in the amount of $1.355 billion. In addition, allocations have been made to the Social Affairs Envelope to meet the economic development objectives of native people.

In summary, then, economic development per se has not been reduced and there has been a re-profiling of Western Development Fund expenditures.

● (1420)

Hon. Lowell Murray: That is, indeed, a detailed answer, and I shall reserve final judgment on it until I have had an opportunity to read it. But the bottom line seems to be that there has been a re-profiling of the fund. That is a new phrase that has come to us from the bureaucracy or, perhaps, from the political advisers, through the minister—I do not know which.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps from the minister himself.

Senator Murray: Perhaps from the minister himself, as the Leader of the Opposition suggests. In any case, I shall read it and have more questions to ask about it in a day or two.

BRIEFING LUNCHEON FOR JOURNALISTS—ALLEGED RESPONSIBILITY OF MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in the meantime, I would like to give the Minister of State for Economic Development an opportunity to refute the calumny that is being uttered against him in some quarters of the press, to the effect that he was responsible for the extravagant arrangements for the luncheon that the Minister of Finance offered to certain select members of the media a week or ten days ago.

If the minister indeed bears part of the responsibility for that luncheon, then I would like to give him the opportunity to say that he is going to dig into his own pocket and share the expenses, personally, with the Minister of Finance—

Hon. Robert Muir: Why blame it on Allan?

Senator Murray: —the Minister of Finance being an impecunious Cape Bretoner who is just getting over the expense of his disastrous run for the Liberal leadership in 1968.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not want to refute anything, and I am not, therefore, particularly grateful to my honourable friend for giving me the chance to do so, but it indicates again that you can read and report what you choose to and ignore what you choose to. I have read several of those statements, too, and while there was some unidentified official who claimed that the Minister of State for Economic Development had arranged the luncheon, that was refuted by officials within the staff of the Minister of Finance. If my honourable friend wants to go along that shaky trail and read only those parts of the statement into the record, that is his choice, but it has no validity whatsoever.

Senator Murray: I am glad to have the minister's denial.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MANITOBA—WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND ALLOCATIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to come back to the question of the Western Development Fund that was adverted to a few minutes ago, and confirm the fact that the funds allocated over a three-year period have been reduced from $2 billion previously to $860 million now, which is a very substantial reduction after taking into account the transfers to other envelopes. If that is not right, then my honourable friend can correct me.

Really the point of my question is this: When he was explaining to the Senate why there had been this reduction in the Western Development Fund—which I think he will admit has happened, even though he may not agree on the precise figures at the moment—he stated that this was done because of the additional revenues that had accrued to certain western provinces as a result of the oil settlements with Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Where does that leave the province of Manitoba? I presume that some part of this Western Development Fund would be intended for use in the improvement of the affairs of the province of Manitoba. They are going to need any improvement my honourable friend can give them in the next four years, I suspect—

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): As they had a Tory government for the last four years, they need all the help they can get.

Senator Roblin: Well, now that they have an N.D.P. one they are going to need even more help than that.

I am at a loss for words. Senator Stewart's gesture leaves me speechless.

[Senator Olson.]

To get back to my point, what are the advantages for the province of Manitoba—apart from their own provincial taxation of gasoline, which is an ad valorem tax and, therefore, there may be some advantage to them with increasing prices? Their oil production is very small, and I have not seen any agreement with them about prices.

Does my honourable friend lump Manitoba in with the others as to benefits received from the settlement of the NEP regarding increases that might have accrued to provincial revenues; and, if he does, what are the figures? If he does not, how does he justify reducing the impact of the Western Development Fund with respect to Manitoba?

● (1425)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, first, the total allocations from the Western Development Fund have not been reduced to $800 million. Indeed, the aggregate of the allocations that have been made from the fund are $1.895 billion, which includes an amount of $148 million which has been spent during the fiscal year 1981-82, plus $1.355 billion allocated to transportation for the years that are identified; also an amount—I forget the exact figure, but it starts out with $75 million for native economic development for the coming fiscal year, the amount then going up. I presume that Manitoba will benefit from both those programs as much as any other province. The province's economic capability will be expanded, probably with a major concentration of the transportation funds on the railway sector, and certainly the economic development that will result from assisting native groups in all of the western provinces will apply equally to Manitoba.

With regard to the additional revenues that may come to provincial treasuries, it may be that there will be a fairly significant difference—perhaps a difference in the amount of the production of gas and oil, and the changes in those revenues as a result of the agreement. Those changes may not fall equally on all four provinces. I am certain that the difference between Alberta and Saskatchewan will be as significant as that between Saskatchewan and Manitoba, for example.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has raised the question of the figures for the Western Development Fund. I would appreciate any clarification that he can give me, because, as I listened to his figures—and it is rather hard to catch them all as they are fired across the chamber—I gathered that he was including in the Western Development Fund a large amount of money with respect to transportation.

Senator Olson: It is $1.355 billion.

Senator Roblin: When was that part of the Western Development Fund? Is it part of the original operation?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is an announcement that was made by the Minister of Finance on November 12 when he laid his budget before the other chamber.

Senator Roblin: Well, that's just fine, because the way he beefs up the Western Development Fund is to pick up large items of expenditure which previously were in other categories, and to say, "From now on we are going to call this part of the Western Development Fund." In my opinion, that is changing the rules of the game in the middle of the operation, in just the same way as including the $82 million for the grain embargo as part of the Western Development Fund. It seems to be a most questionable practice indeed, considering what we were told about this when it started out. So I wish my honourable friend would put me right on this, and perhaps give me in writing a statement of what is in the Western Development Fund expenditure at present, and of whether the same categories were in the fund in the last budget speech.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I give my honourable friend an undertaking that I shall go through the minister's budget speech and find those passages which say exactly what I have said about the allocation of funds for transportation and native economic development, and will provide him with more precise figures. But my honourable friend should understand that the amount of $1.895 billion represents the allocations that have been made from the Western Development Fund to date. There will be other budgets before the expiry of the time frame, and perhaps there will be additional allocations. With respect to economic incentives in western Canada, the two categories that have been identified are, in the view of the government, of the highest priority and therefore allocations have been made to them.

● (1430)

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend should give consideration to changing the name of this from "Western Development Fund" to "Western Development Balloon". "Balloon" is a good word because the size of the fund seems to depend on the amount of hot air that is pushed into it, and the number of changes the government introduces to make their case look a little better. I am, however, going to await my honourable friend's information on this subject, and then we may have some further words on it.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)—VETERANS AFFAIRS— PROPOSED REFERRAL OF VOTE TO HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in connection with supplementary estimates (C).

I understand these supplementary estimates have been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. My interest is in the vote under the heading of Veterans Affairs. I am wondering through what process that could be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science so that that committee may investigate and question some of the items of interest in that vote.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, earlier today the Deputy Chairman of the National Finance Committee, Senator Leblanc, presented the committee's report on supplementary estimates (C). I presume, as a consequence, that the committee has finished its deliberations on the subject. That report will be considered on Tuesday next.

If I understand Senator Marshall's question correctly, it is a matter of having another committee consider one vote in supplementary estimates (C). One way of doing that, of course, would be to ask that the subject matter in question be referred to the committee mentioned by Senator Marshall. This would not mean that that committee would necessarily be in a position to deal with that item in supplementary estimates (C) insofar as recommending its adoption is concerned, because that would be considered when those estimates are presented for approval. I suggest that is one way of accomplishing this.

THE BUDGET

IMPACT ON PROVINCIAL AND TERRITORIAL REVENUES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address another question to the Minister of State for Economic Development, and refer him to page 50 of the document, Fiscal Arrangements in the Eighties—Proposals of the Government of Canada, which was presented by the Minister of Finance when he brought down his budget the other day.

On that page the minister will find a table which was the subject of some discussion in this chamber last week, entitled "Net Impact on Provincial and Territorial Revenues of Budget Tax Changes and Proposed Savings by the Federal Government." This table was also the subject of some discussion at the recent meeting of finance ministers in Halifax. It came out that the calculation was wrong by 30 per cent, and that although the net disadvantage to the provinces is shown as $1.9 billion in this book, the Minister of Finance had to admit that it was substantially more than that, and that in fact it was $2.5 billion instead.

I wonder if my honourable friend—I do not expect him to have this at his fingertips—would be kind enough to have a look at that table and explain where the correction comes in and which particular years are affected in this way, so that we may know the reason for the error and what a corrected chart would look like.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will try to obtain that information by early next week, or as soon as I can get a reply from the Department of Finance.

Senator Roblin: Can my honourable friend tell me whether there are other areas of the same sort in this budget where we might look for mistakes in arithmetic?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am sure that the members of the opposition regard the government and its administration as perfect. We try to be perfect as often as we can. There is, however, the odd and very rare occasion when errors and omissions do creep in. We are sorry that we don't live up to the expectation of perfection that honourable members opposite cherish, but we do most of the time.

Senator Roblin: I really would not like to leave my honourable friend under the misapprehension that I regard him and his colleagues as perfect. The plain truth is that I do not. In fact, I regret to say that they are exceedingly accident prone.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have asked a question about the Garrison Dam many times, as have others. A bill was recently passed in the United States—I believe it was around November 22—whereby another amount of money has been allocated for the development of the Garrison. The people connected with the Garrison—the senators and representatives from the area down there in North Dakota—have been pushing for a resumption of work on the Garrison diversion. Many requests have been made to the leader and the deputy leader with regard to getting an appropriate progress report as we go along to see how we are making out. I do not want to wait until there is a crisis, if I may use that word, and we have to say, "They have started on this thing again due to the fact that the money has been provided, notwithstanding any court decision."

President Reagan has approved this amount of money, and I am getting a little concerned. This is in contradiction of what we were told previously, and I believe it is fair for me to ask for a progress report in this regard, with assurances that diplomatic discussions are taking place.

I happen to know that the ex-premier of Manitoba made valiant efforts with regard to the Garrison. The new premier has committed himself also. That, however, does not seem to be enough. I believe there must be some commitment on the part of the federal government to reassure us in Manitoba that this will not take place, because it will destroy all the fresh water, and fish and other wildlife, in that area.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it seems to me that the request for ongoing reports is a reasonable one. In the meantime, I can inform honourable senators—and they may have noticed it—that on November 19 the United States House of Representatives rejected by 314 votes to 67 the U.S. Senate-approved Burdick amendment, which would have given instructions to proceed with the Garrison project despite a court order banning further construction. The Burdick amendment, which would have been a step forward from the point of view of the Garrison supporters, and a step backwards as far as we are concerned, was defeated. The issue will have to be resolved by the United States Congress in a House/Senate conference.

The government, needless to say, is pleased by this outcome, which follows vigorous efforts by the Canadian embassy and personal representations by Ambassador Towe and former Premier Lyon, to ensure that members of the House of Representatives were fully aware of Canada's concern. We appear to have been successful since, reportedly, Canada's active opposition was among the reasons cited for rejecting the amendment.

I have another note here, but perhaps I had better not read it because I do not thoroughly understand what the reference is with regard to Mr. Murta. I will leave that for the moment.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, Senator Frith has made reference to the amendment that was defeated. That amendment was defeated before November 20 and 21, on which dates, according to my information, a bill was passed providing funds for the Garrison.

I have before me a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press dated Monday, November 23, 1981, which reads:

WASHINGTON (AP): —The U.S. Senate passed and sent to President Reagan on Saturday a $12.5-billion bill that provides money for more than 200 energy and water projects, including the stalled Garrison diversion project in North Dakota.

It is because of this that I am so concerned. I keep getting reassurances all the time, but this thing is going ahead just the same. This is what I am trying to get across. I would like the deputy leader to comment on this again, and tell me that I am not exaggerating.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the state of play, as far as the Burdick amendment is concerned, is as I answered previously. Information as to the item that was sent by the United States Senate to the President will be included in the undertaking I gave earlier. We will get an up-to-date report on that matter also.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question of the deputy leader in respect of this same matter? I preface my remarks by pointing out to him that the action of the U.S. House of Representatives really had nothing to do with the appropriation of money. It had solely to do with the opinion of the United States Senate that they should short-circuit or nullify legal proceedings which were in course. That particular matter was not agreed to by the House of Representatives. As far as I know, however, that had nothing to do with the fact that money was actually provided for this. Therefore, if the legal hurdle is surmounted by those who favour the Garrison project, the money is there.

I understand that there has been a new liaison committee set up consisting of the American ambassador to Canada and the Canadian ambassador to the United States. They are to meet on a confidential basis, with not too many advisers around, to try to deal with matters in dispute between the two countries. Has the matter of the Garrison diversion been taken up by this committee of ambassadors? Is it on their agenda? Can they make any report to us as to the disposition of it?

I believe the question has some importance because on a previous occasion the American ambassador, when speaking in the west, gave the most comforting assurances that indeed the matter is dead, yet it seems to be revived every weekend. If my honourable friend would be kind enough to check into the matter with respect to these ambassadorial talks, that may give us some idea as to what the future may hold.

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators, that will certainly be included in the information that I undertook to obtain to be sure that we are au courant on this development.

As to the relationship between the Burdick amendment and the Garrison diversion, I simply wanted to bring to the attention of honourable senators the fact that a court order had been given banning further construction and that the Burdick amendment attempted to nullify the court decision. That is what was defeated by the House of Representatives.

Senator Roblin: That is correct.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Charbonneau on October 27, concerning possible government assistance to Chrysler for an engine plant in Canada.

Chrysler is proposing a joint venture with the Perkins Engine Company to design, develop and produce diesel engines in Canada. Government assistance has been requested to enable this venture to proceed.

This request is being evaluated in terms of its commercial viability, its benefit to Canada, and the nature and level of assistance necessary to ensure that the venture is not lost to Canada. The nature of the conditions that would be appropriate can only be determined when this preliminary work has been completed. This work is under way and it will be completed as expeditiously as possible.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF NINTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the ninth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented on Tuesday, November 17, 1981.

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, on October 20 I gave a speech in this chamber on the seventh report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. This report dealt with and registered its objections to the process by which the government created VIA Rail. Honourable senators will recall that, instead of introducing a bill in Parliament to create VIA Rail, they slipped the necessary authorization into the estimates, which were then approved in an appropriation act. If a proper act of Parliament had been enacted, I am reasonably certain that the Minister of Transport and the government would not have been subjected to the criticisms aimed at them in the report I am discussing today, which also deals with VIA Rail.

I might mention, at this point, that my speech on the seventh report was not exactly a best seller. I have a circle of personal friends to whom I send copies of my speeches, and, without exception, those I talked to found some difficulty in following it—a difficulty which I do not think was shared by my colleagues in the Senate, who have greater familiarity with legislative procedures and who know the difference between the procedures required to enact an ordinary bill and those required to pass an appropriation act.

The report I am discussing today was referred to by the press as being highly legalistic. That, I am afraid, is inevitable. As we say in our report:

Your Committee did not consider and is not now reporting on the merits of the policy embodied in the order. Whether the cutbacks in railway passenger services are a good thing or not is none of your Committee's business. Your Committee is concerned, as ever, with the means used to achieve policy ends, and not with those ends themselves.

The C. D. Howe Institute recently published a study entitled Government in Business, which was written by Marsha Gordon. The study, in the words of Carl E. Beigie, the president of the institute, provides a partial documentation of government intervention in the Canadian economy. Mr. Beigie, in his preface to the report, says:

Although the number of cases for which equivalent privately owned companies could be identified was very limited, the comparative analyses that were possible show no clear and systematic evidence—after taking into account the policy functions that crown corporations are expected to carry out (such as the creation and/or maintenance of employment, support of research and development activity, and the enhancement of a particular province)—that private companies have consistently outperformed their counterpart crown corporations.

These policy functions represent a fundamental issue in the role of government in society.

The study points out that from the outset of the CNR:

The problem was one of balancing public demand for service with financial responsibility to the taxpayers. Worker layoffs became political issues, with the public demanding maintenance of employment regardless of costs.

The confusion about its objectives hampered CN's ability to adopt basic corporate goals—goals that could be translated into operational decisions.

It was left to the top management to maintain the delicate balance between the pressures of running a business and the need to respond to the social goals of the government of the day.

[Senator Godfrey.]

The same problem exists with VIA Rail. In its last two general reports, VIA Rail pleaded for a clear mandate from the government. The government paid no heed either to the appeals from VIA Rail or to the appeals from our committee, which were made over several years and which culminated in our seventh report criticizing the government for not bringing in a VIA Rail act. This, among other things, could have amended the Railway Act so as to introduce new factors which the Canadian Transport Commission should consider in applications to abandon railway services.

This brings me to the report which I am discussing today. The government, apparently with considerable prodding from VIA Rail, was faced with making what was essentially a political decision. VIA Rail advised the government that to make their passenger services viable, particularly in the corridor from Windsor to Quebec City, they needed $100 million of new equipment. The annual deficit from the operation of VIA Rail was expected to reach $500 million.

The government decided that $500 million was the maximum deficit from VIA Rail that they would approve and that VIA Rail, in order to get the necessary $100 million, would have to reduce its deficit by that amount through the elimination of some passenger services. It was the recommendation of VIA Rail—and this was accepted by the government—that most of the money could be saved by having only one train from Halifax to Montreal and one transcontinental train to Vancouver, instead of the two which were then running. One of these trains from Halifax went through Saint John and the State of Maine, and was eliminated. One of the transcontinental trains took the northern route through Saskatoon, Edmonton and Jasper, and was also eliminated. There were, of course, other passenger services eliminated, including three trains into Toronto that were extensively used by commuters as the trains neared Toronto.

No matter what the government did and no matter how justified it was, there was bound to be an uproar when it announced the passenger services that were to be eliminated. The government was in a dilemma. Because there was no VIA Rail Act, there was nothing specifically laid down as to the procedure the government should follow in closing down passenger services in order to reduce an overall deficit so that the remaining services could be improved. Back in 1976 they tried using the Canadian Transport Commission to help them accomplish their purpose. The CTC was directed to conduct an overall review of the railway passenger system under the existing Railway Act.

● (1450)

As noted in the C.D. Howe Institute study:

In 1977 the federal Minister of Transport wrote a letter to CN's board of directors that emphasized government's support for the commercialization process. Although "the impression has persisted that Canadian National should be used as an instrument of public policy even at the expense of commercial performance," wrote the Minister, "it is the view of the government that CN should make every attempt to conduct its affairs with a commercial attitude and in a commercial manner."

Thus there was less emphasis on social policy consideration in the conduct of railways.

The government evidently hoped that this policy regarding the railways would get through to the CTC with respect to VIA Rail and would result in the CTC's recommending that a substantial amount of the passenger services be discontinued. The CTC refused to bite and were not at all helpful. As provided for in the Railway Act, they identified those passenger routes which were uneconomic but said that most of them should be kept going in the public interest.

Our committee, in its report, agreed with the CTC that its function under the Railway Act is not to try to assist the government in solving its overall social and budgeting problems. In the opinion of the committee it would "be unlawful to give a specific direction to the Canadian Transport Commission to save $100 million by eliminating particular services so that the money saved could be spent on new equipment for use on some of the remaining services."

Our committee agreed, therefore, with the government that the CTC could not lawfully be involved in the process.

The government did, however, indirectly involve the CTC, when the government decided to use section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act. That section provides that the Governor in Council, at any time upon its own initiative, may vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the CTC. Since the original enactment of that section in 1903, only two other instances have occurred in which the Governor in Council has used, on its own initiative, the power contained in section 64(1). One was in 1980, when the recently enacted air carrier regulations were altered, and the other was in 1978, when the section was used to restore daily passenger services on the Sudbury-White River line which had recently been cut back by the CTC.

Our committee operates under 15 criteria approved by the House of Commons and the Senate. The fourth criterion has to do with whether any regulation "makes some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the enabling statute".

Clearly, this regulation has been used in an unusual and unexpected way, in view of the history of its use in the past and the clear intent that it is essentially an appeal mechanism for decisions of the CTC. In rescinding the order of the CTC, the Governor in Council clearly did not substitute its view as to how the CTC should have applied the statutory tests which governed the CTC's decision. Instead, the Governor in Council proceeded on the basis of considerations which the CTC itself could not legally have entertained. What could possibly be more unusual and unexpected than that? Clearly, the regulation offends the committee's fourth criterion, and the committee was under a duty to so report to both houses.

The eighth criterion has to do with whether a regulation "appears for any reason to infringe... the rules of natural justice."

What are the rules of natural justice? Put simply, "natural justice" was originally a legal concept that anyone affected by a decision made by a public person or body acting in a judicial or quasi-judicial fashion should have the opportunity to be heard, should have the opportunity to present his case. That does not necessarily mean that there must be a public hearing. The opportunity to make written representations may be sufficient.

In the 1980 case of Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, reported at 115 Dominion Law Reports, third edition, page 1, the Supreme Court of Canada held that the terms of a statute might imply that in the administrative or executive field there is also a general duty of fairness. The court held that when the Governor in Council acts under the authority of section 64(1) it is exercising a legislative power, and not an administrative, judicial or quasi-judicial one. Therefore, a duty to observe procedural fairness is not to be implied to the jurisdiction of the Governor in Council in those circumstances.

However, the eighth criterion is not restricted to the legal concept of the rules of natural justice, because the enactment of a regulation means, by definition, the exercise of a legislative rather than an administrative or judicial function.

One of the things the committee looks at, therefore, under the eighth criterion is whether, in the exercise of a legislative power to enact legislation by regulation, persons or bodies affected by the regulation have been given an opportunity to be heard, to have some input in the regulation-making process, whether or not they had the legal right to be heard.

May I remind honourable senators that in the fourth report of our committee for this session, which dealt extensively with the whole question of regulatory reform, we came out very strongly for what is known as notice and comment procedures. As explained in detail in our report, this simply means that before any regulation is enacted those particularly interested, including any member of the public, should be given an adequate opportunity to be heard. When we talked about notice and comment procedures, we were not thinking about the formality of formal adjudicative-type hearings but something considerably more informal. May I quote from paragraph 49 of our report:

Very often policy has become frozen by the time a draft regulation is prepared. Attempts at modification, change or abandonment are likely to be met with resistance. Therefore, your Committee recommends that wherever possible notice of proposed regulation making should be given before a draft regulation is prepared and published. The notice should indicate the policy to be effected and the object to be achieved and invite representations as to both the policy itself and the means to be employed.

That, may I say, is a type of procedure which could have been used in this case. The rules of natural justice would have been satisfied. What did the government do? I will quote now from paragraph 17 of the report under discussion today:

Apart from "leaks" no notice was given to those affected, whether users or employees, even though the actual cuts in service now made were under active consideration as far back as March 1980 and probably earlier. No opportunity has been given for public input or representations. No chance has been given to anyone to challenge the statistics on which the Government has based its actions. Here your Committee notes that up-to-date statistics are always compiled for hearings on particular services by the Railway Transport Committee and otherwise do not exist. The Governor in Council has not only run the risk of proceeding on an incorrect statistical basis but has also deprived himself of the opportunity to show that he has used accurate figures to justify the policy pursued and to demonstrate its wisdom.

We then conclude our report by saying:

Reliance on hearings held three years ago and more in an entirely different context is not satisfaction of a genuine notice and comment procedure. The Governor in Council's manner of proceeding in this instance also flies in the face of the specific recommendations of the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Regulatory Reform for the observance of "procedural deficiencies" when the Governor in Council acts of his own motion under section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act. The Canadian Transport Commission would not order the discontinuance of a single service, far less a wholesale abandonment of services, without prior notice to and hearing from the public. It does not appear to your Committee that the Governor in Council should do so. An opportunity for the public to be heard might take many forms, including the successful technique used in 1980, a Special Committee of the House of Commons.

● (1500)

You will note that the last sentence of our report is very carefully drafted. We do not say that formal adjudicative hearings have to be held. When this report was presented to the committee I was asked, as I had drafted that particular sentence, what other forms I had in mind. Well, in addition to the type of notice and comment procedures, I have quoted from paragraph 49 of our report on regulatory reform. I also had in mind the government issuing either a green or white paper. A white paper was used when extensive changes in our tax system were proposed by the Honourable Edgar Benson a good many years ago. A green paper was used when extensive changes to our Immigration Act were being considered.

To follow the procedure adopted here was really inexcusable and, may I say, politically dumb. The government, by waiting until after Parliament adjourned, and by keeping their intentions secret, obviously hoped to minimize controversy. They were just "too clever by 'arf'" and they deserve the criticism they are getting from the press, the public, the opposition, and in this report, as to the procedure they used.

As I have pointed out, our report does not specifically comment on the merits of what they did. That does not stop me from doing so personally. My impression—and it is only that, because I am not in possession of all the facts—is that they were probably right in what they did. It is only the way they went about it to which I take strong exception. If they were going to have the political courage to make a very unpopular but probably necessary decision, then they should have gone the whole way, and should not have adopted a procedure which was wrong and which backfired upon them.

Finally, again on a personal note, I would like to say a word about the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, the Minister of Transport. In my opinion, he is a great Canadian. I have long been one of his most ardent admirers and I always shall be. However, even the greatest of men make the occasional mistake and I personally do not think any the less of him for making this one. It genuinely grieves me that it was necessary to criticize in this report the procedures recommended by him to the government.

It was John Kenneth Galbraith who said that politics is not the art of the possible; it consists of choosing between the disastrous and the unpalatable. In the future, I hope that the effect of our report and the public outcry will be that when the government does choose the unpalatable option, they will not try to make it more palatable by following improper procedures. They just will not get away with it in the future, any more than they did in this instance.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—
DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled: "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Bonnell).

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave, I yield to Senator Rousseau.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvette B. Rousseau: Honourable senators, some time ago, a valuable and vital document was tabled in the Senate, namely, the report "Child at Risk" prepared by the Senate Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. We are indebted for this document first of all to Senators Bonnell and McGrand and to their entire team. We wish to express our appreciation for the quality and objectivity of their report. Other senators have aired their views and made suggestions, and today I should like to offer some comments on the need for implementing the report's recommendations and put forward some ideas that could expand the scope of the debate.

Why is it necessary that we should give this subject our attention? There are two major reasons: First, the rapid growth in the incidence of violence and crime in our society, especially among young people. If the trend continues, our young people, who are the future of this country, may be ill-prepared to take on their future responsibilities. The second reason is that it is very costly to continue supporting expenditures at the federal and provincial levels of well over half a billion dollars per year on a penitentiary system that is concerned with the incarceration and rehabilitation of criminals and delinquents. In view of the rising incidence of violence and crime, more institutions and further expenditures are to be expected, which will not necessarily bring about any substantial improvement. In fact, the present approach to this problem does not appear to be effective either as a cure or as a preventive measure. The report stressed that very little progress could be made because of a lack of flexibility in the current approach and an inadequate knowledge of the situation.

These two factors have made me think how we could make Canada a better place to live for future generations. I am sure that many Canadians agree it is necessary to take very definite action as soon as possible. There is a great need to provide help and protection for the child and to provide the parents, the educators and the communities with all the assistance required, including sound knowledge of their impact in this regard.

In the report, the problem of violence and delinquency was considered at three stages of the development of the child, namely the prenatal, the perinatal and the postnatal stages. I believe that our consideration of this problem and our search for solutions must not stop there, because the problem continues to exist as long as human beings of any age and any category are affected by harmful influences or get carried away by unbalanced emotional tendencies. These last few years, our structures and our institutions have evolved considerably and it is time to implement the appropriate policies, programs and mechanisms to face this situation and its future evolution.

The roots of the problem have been identified in the report. We believe that it is now time to go beyond simple statements of fact and to implement a structure which would examine what action should be taken, for instance, by encouraging one or more organizations either to give the matter careful thought to determine what concrete action may be taken, or to implement the essential elements of the recommendations contained in the report.

I believe that action is required and I think that we should set up a national committee, which could include representatives of all the provinces, to explain the contents of the Senate report and its impact on family and child education. This committee should be national and have offices in every province, including the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, to ensure coherent action and the development of a family policy which will meet the basic needs of the Canadian family.

Moreover, we should voice our support for those proposals in the report which we believe relevant. I am thinking in this regard about the establishment of a Canadian Institute for the Study of Violence in Society. In this regard, recommendation 28 is of major importance. This institute should have a sound financial basis provided by the federal government and be open to any individual or organization interested in the research and the study of the direct and indirect causes which can contribute to create a violence-prone environment.

We also agree with recommendation 2 on page 68 which advocates training courses for parents. We consider this aspect vitally important because if parents are taught to understand the importance of and the relationships between the phenomena which influence prenatal and perinatal development, their awareness will increase, and this could reduce and, in some cases, eliminate many problems of violence. Honourable senators, it is unfortunate that, in 1981, there are so many more children than parents, even with our lower birth rate.

These two recommendations make us realize that family education is often undermined by a lack of knowledge. Indeed, this is important to realize because the family is a privileged environment in which the child must develop and find a happy and balanced future, both for the sake of his mental and physical health and his future in society. This parallels the intent of recommendation 154 on page 54, which reads as follows:

In order to protect children from harmful influences in early life—and thereby to prevent future criminal behaviour, it is necessary for governments and the community to promote, in the areas of education, medicine and social programs, the healthy and optimal relationship between parent and child. All that is possible should be done to see that every small child is provided through the early years of life with the adequate and consistent, affectionate care it needs.

I believe that this recommendation 154 is still more important today if, like me, many of you read in yesterday's Globe and Mail and Le Droit an article about children being separated needlessly from their families. This should make us think.

A family policy is close to our hearts. I am referring of course to recommendations 162 and 166. Those two recommendations give the general outline of measures to be taken in an effort to establish programs designed for parents or for all persons responsible for a child.

We ought to emphasize the need to hold seminars across the country to make professionals and parents fully aware of an educational system based on the perception of the importance of the role of parents towards the child. Pilot projects could be launched to make it possible to highlight the outcome of that endeavour.

In conclusion, we should not forget the importance of taking corrective action within the news media which, either because of a lack of selectivity or because they are motivated by sensational copy and the wish to boost their clientele, forget the harm they may cause. They cannot shirk their responsibility.

ty. The news media must become the complement of a preventive and sound family and institutional education by improving the quality and the objectivity of the news and by conveying realistic information likely to promote human progress. Thus they would avoid contributing to make the citizens vulnerable to influences which are not in keeping with sound objectives for the future of children and families thanks to which a nation can prosper. The number of inhabitants alone does not suffice, for a country must also have a human quality and that human quality will not reach its peak if the media do not accept their responsibilities.

Honourable senators, the quality of our young people, tomorrow's generations of adults, is at stake. Perhaps we stand at the crossroads and we have to get involved by going beyond the report and taking the necessary steps so that it will be possible to implement this report with a view to improving the development of the Canadian family, which used to be one of the main pillars of our civilization and which should be still, particularly so in this day and age of giant progress in the fields of technology and communications.

On motion of Senator Bielish, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT
FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1982

NOVEMBER 25, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982 were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, November 17, 1981, examined the said Supplementary Estimates (C) and reports as follows:

(1) The Committee was authorized by the Senate as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of November 17, 1981 to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

(2) In obedience to the foregoing, your Committee examined the Supplementary Estimates (C) and heard evidence from the following officials from the Treasury Board: the Honourable D. J. Johnston, President; Mr. L. J. O'Toole, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch; Mr. H. J. Mullington, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch; Mr. E. R. Stimpson, Director General, Budget Co-ordination Group. Mr. Norman Kelly, Parliamentary Secretary to the President was also present.

(3) These Supplementary Estimates (C) total $3,877 million. The budgetary expenditures total $3,865 million of which $874 million are statutory items and $2,991 million represent funds for which Parliament is being asked to provide new authority. The non-budgetary expenses, that is to say, loans, investments, and advances include $31 million to be voted and a reduction of $19 million in statutory items. The total estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982 are now increased to $69,055 million.

(4) Treasury Board supplied the Committee with a list giving additional explanations for the $1 Votes included in Supplementary Estimates (C) which is attached as an Appendix to this Report.

Format of the Estimates

(5) The President of the Treasury Board informed the Committee of the progress he has made in developing and implementing a revised format for the presentation of the Main Estimates. Under this revised format, each Minister would present additional information on the estimates for the department in question, relating the projected expenditures to the department's overall objectives and individual policy initiatives.

(6) Unfortunately, the timetable for the use of this new format appears to be very long. It will be another year before the Treasury Board will be prepared to discuss the final format for the estimates, and full implementation of the revisions will not take place until fiscal 1985-86. Moreover, it is not clear at this time that the revisions will extend to the presentation of additional material than is presently available at the time of tabling supplementary estimates.

(7) Improved information is essential to the Parliamentary evaluation of the government's estimates. Therefore we urge that this timetable be moved forward as much as possible, and that consideration be given to revising the presentation of supplementary estimates to incorporate additional background information.

Dollar Votes

(8) Earlier this year, the Speaker of the other place ruled a number of items to be inappropriate for inclusion in a piece of supply legislation. This resulted in the tabling of Supplementary Estimates (B) in June. The President of the Treasury Board reported that his officials have undertaken to change the wording of the votes where necessary in order to reflect the ruling of the Speaker. In addition, the President is ensuring that the legislative authority is identified for the transfer of funds within programs and for the provision of grants.

(9) Upon questioning by the Committee members, the Treasury Board officials explained that the dollar vote reported under the Department of Public Works is to provide a transfer of funds for a study on the development of appeals procedures for municipalities. The dollar votes reported under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are to authorize the increase in expenditures by the Minister's Office and to reallocate funds originally identified for subsidiary agreements on water supply and drought control with Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Government Accounting

(10) A recent report of the Auditor General of Canada which criticized government accounting methods was discussed. According to the Auditor General's report, government debt is actually some $9 billion higher than reported according to the government's accounting practices. The bulk of the difference between the Auditor General and the government appears to arise out of the treatment of unfunded pension obligations of the federal government. The Committee has requested additional information in this regard, and has recommended that the government attempt to resolve this difference of professional opinion as soon as possible.

Role of Treasury Board

(11) Over the past few years, the government has been moving progressively to a new system of expenditure and policy control. Under the envelope system, Committees of Cabinet are responsible for the joint coordination of the policy and spending conducted by the members of the Committees. Thus, for example, spending on Economic Development is coordinated by the Cabinet Committee on Economic Development, chaired by the Minister of State for Economic Development. In some ways then these Committees have usurped a role traditionally held by the Treasury Board of Cabinet, and have caused a potentially significant change in the conduct of government policy.

(12) In his testimony before us, the President of the Treasury Board indicated that the overall authority of the Treasury Board has not diminished since the Office of the Comptroller General also reports to him. The responsibilities of the Treasury Board have in fact been divided between the Secretariat, which continues to review and authorize departmental expenditures, and the Office of the Comptroller General, which reviews the control mechanisms and management practices in place in departments and oversees the evaluation of all programs.

(13) With regard to the role of the recently established ministries of state, the President explained that the Treasury Board retains final authority over the A Base Budget, which identifies expenditure levels for existing programs. Any changes to the A Base are carefully monitored with regard to standard, authorities, terms and conditions. The ministries of state are more concerned with the coordination of policy and expenditures within the envelope, as well as the initiation of new programs under the B Base Budget (or policy reserve). Treasury Board has in effect delegated some policy and expenditure management responsibilities to the ministries of state but the Board still maintains control of expenditures and the allocation of person years.

VIA Rail

(14) Treasury Board officials were questioned with regard to the supplementary estimate made in conjunction with payments to VIA Rail for the operation of rail passenger service. This supplementary, in the amount of $107 million dollars has been adjusted to account for savings resulting from the recently implemented curtailment of rail passenger service, and raises the total payments to VIA Rail to $506.2 million for fiscal 1981-82.

Public Debt Financing

(15) The largest single estimate in these supplementaries is the increase in the amount allocated for interest, bond discount, premiums and commissions relating to the costs of financing the public debt. The increase, in the amount of $2.357 billion, is equal to over 19% of the original estimate, and raises total costs in this regard to $14.67 billion.

(16) The principal factor underlying this increased estimate is the increase in interest rates which has occurred since the Main Estimates 1981-82 were tabled. A Treasury Board official reported that costs related to bond financing had risen by some 300 basis points. Those relative to treasury bill financing rose by some 700 basis points and Canada Savings Bonds costs were 900 basis points above earlier estimates.

Respectfully submitted,
D. D. EVERETT

Chairman

LIST OF ONE DOLLAR VOTES

INCLUDED IN

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C), 1981-82

The 7 One Dollar Votes included in these Estimates are listed in Appendix I by ministry and agency along with the page number where each vote may be located in the Estimates.

These One Dollar Votes are grouped below into categories according to their prime purpose. The votes are also identified in Appendix I according to these categories. The category for each vote has been designated by an "X".

- A. Four votes which authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates).
- B. Two votes which authorize the payment of grants. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates).
- C. One vote which amends a previous Appropriation Act (Additional explanation is provided in Appendix II).

Category C—Amendment of a Previous Appropriation Act

Transport

Vote 40c—To extend the purposes of this Vote in order to authorize the National Harbours Board to carry out a further two projects totalling $1,876,000.

Explanation—The 1981-82 Main Estimates provided for a payment of $39,664,000 to the National Harbours Board to finance certain specific projects at various Canadian ports as listed in the wording to Vote 40. This Vote was approved by Appropriation Act No. 2, 1981-82.

It is proposed to expand the Vote wording for this Vote to permit the Board to carry out the following port related projects:

—Completion of dredging at the Port of Churchill, Manitoba	$1,076,000
—Infrastructure costs for the coal handling facilities at Prince Rupert, B.C.	800,000
	<hr/> $1,876,000

There are sufficient funds within Vote 40 not only to finance these new projects but also to provide for a transfer of $1,699,999 to Vote 35c.

THE SENATE

MR. RICHARD GREENE, CLERK ASSISTANT—FELICITATIONS UPON COMPLETION OF TWENTY-FIVE YEARS OF SERVICE TO THE SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity on behalf of many senators to acknowledge the fact that 25 years ago today Mr. Richard Greene, our Clerk Assistant, began his work in the Senate. He started as a page, and then went into the messenger service and the committees branch, after which he served us ably as Chief of English Journals.

Today marks Mr. Greene's 25th anniversary as an employee of the Senate. He is our excellent Clerk Assistant, and we are delighted to acknowledge that fact.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY VETERANS AFFAIRS EXPENDITURES IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the supplementary estimates (C), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until next Monday, November 30, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, at this point it would perhaps be helpful if the government could tell us why we are coming back Monday, and also what the agenda will be for next week, particularly in view of the fact that the resolution on the Constitution which is now before the House of Commons might be referred to the Senate.

Perhaps we could discuss the matter, and I should like either the Deputy Leader or the Leader of the Government to indicate how he intends to proceed, especially in view of the talks and discussions we have already had.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Official Opposition has pointed out part of the reason or the real reason why we suggested that next week the Senate sit Monday evening instead of Tuesday evening. It comes as a result of our discussions, since we want to be ready to start our debate on the constitutional resolution should the debate in the other house end, let us say, tomorrow evening or perhaps Monday afternoon.

Regarding the second part of the question, namely the discussions which took place between Senator Flynn, myself and Senator Perrault, perhaps the Leader of the Government could specify the nature of these discussions and inform us what the agenda will be for next week.

● (1410)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there have been discussions and conversations in both the other place and the Senate regarding the disposition of the motion, notice of which was given by me on November 19, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution. I want to express my appreciation for the opportunity I have had to discuss this matter with the Leader of the Opposition in this house, and other honourable senators. We have talked in terms of what the Senate debating requirements may be, and the time that may be necessary to dispose of this historic and very important motion.

I think it can be said that it is felt that probably the debate could be undertaken here in a period of something like three days. We hope to have further discussions this afternoon with the Leader of the Opposition on this point. The Leader of the Opposition, of course, earlier expressed the view that the Senate debate should commence after the debate in the other place had been concluded. This is a view that I find quite acceptable. Those who serve on the government side here would find that to be a reasonable request on the part of the Leader of the Opposition. If we are talking in terms of a three-day debate, to commence here after the vote has been taken in the other place, that may well meet the requirements of honourable senators.

I think we have agreed that opportunities should be made available for senators to move amendments, and that perhaps we can discuss the concept of delayed votes, and scheduling final votes at certain specified times.

We have discussed frankly the idea of a Senate order which would structure in a more detailed manner the way this motion shall be disposed of. There has been no final agreement on this point, but, again, discussions will be carried forward. I have provided the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon with a draft of a suggested order of the Senate. Perhaps this order of the Senate could be considered before the debate is concluded in the other place, but that is a matter which can be discussed with the opposition as well.

I do think we have had a co-operative discussion of events. We hope that members of the Senate will be able to acquit themselves with their usual high standard of performance when this motion is debated here. I know that will be the case.

• (1415)

The Leader of the Opposition may wish to add further remarks as to his understanding of the situation.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the two points which I believe are more important are the beginning of the debate, and the end of the debate. It has been mentioned by the Leader of the Government that the debate in this chamber should not commence before the House of Commons has made its final decision on the resolution. The second important point, to my mind, is to inform the senators that the final vote will be taken on a certain date so that everyone can be present.

As to the length of the debate, I have suggested to the Leader of the Government that, possibly, three days will be enough. In this respect, however, I conveyed to the Leader of the Government that we should have a short discussion on this matter today so that any senator who does not agree can give his or her reasons. I do not think this is a matter that should be decided only between the two leaders here. I would like to have the views of other senators if they do not agree with the decision, because the idea is not to prevent anybody from speaking.

I have another point which may be of interest to the Leader of the Government, and which stems from the draft resolution that he has mentioned. If we have the debate here begin after the House of Commons has disposed of the resolution, I do not see why the text of the resolution introduced and moved by the leader should not be the one adopted by the House of Commons. This will avoid the problem of having to move the amendments which have been adopted. We know that there will be at least two such amendments. It seems to me to be a better idea to have the concurrence of the Senate in the resolution adopted by the other house, rather than the resolution now before us, which does not contain the amendments already made and others which may be made. I am conveying this idea to the Leader of the Government to avoid procedural problems.

Within these parameters, I would certainly be happy to know if other members of the Senate are in agreement with the ideas that have been suggested on both sides.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition has advanced a constructive idea with respect to the motion standing in my name. It would certainly avoid what could be a cumbersome process of moving a series of amendments. The suggestion is an interesting one. I want to say that the government is most interested in the views of other honourable senators on the point raised by Senator Flynn.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I will avail myself of that kind invitation. It would appear to me, since the Senate normally sits on Tuesday evening, and not Monday evening, that the suggestion of the government house leader has an element of haste. Naturally, one asks the reason for such an element of haste.

It would strike me that, whatever is wrong or right about the recent revised constitutional discussions, one of the invidious errors that has been made is that too many things have been done too quickly. People have been saying, "Oh, I didn't know that. I didn't quite understand that." There have been new pressure groups arising, and there has been no response to these pressure groups. I read in the morning press that there are other people who would like to be heard, one group being the handicapped, and I also read the name of our distinguished former colleague, Senator Forsey.

This morning I heard—when I am not listening to my honourable colleagues in the Senate I spend some time listening to the media—that perhaps one reason for the precipitous haste is a desire to head Quebec off at the pass. Now, I am not interested in the tactics employed by the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec. I am, however, most interested in the best possible support for whatever constitutional arrangements emanate from this Parliament. If it means waiting 48 hours, 96 hours, a week, who are we to say that we do not have that time? I ask: What is the rush? It involves much more than procedure. I do not mind being here on Monday. I will be here on Monday morning at 9 o'clock, if necessary. I will be here on Sunday if I am given time for kirk; I will be here on Saturday.

Why is it necessary to meet before we know that the House of Commons has finished? Should we not wait until they have discussed their amendments? It is presumptuous to suggest that we know what they are going to do. Should we turn off the tap of further expressions of public opinion? What is the rush? Is Christmas now the day that people other than Santa Claus must have a special celebration? Why is there not time? Why are we being rushed into this? It is far more than procedure.

● (1420)

I read some very serious things this morning that suggested there was a new anxiety about the eruption of public opinion in mass demonstration. That is something I am most concerned about. I know there are reasons for anxiety in that, but let me say that it is not in any way an exculpation to try to get ahead in these things by rushing the legislative process, and I am concerned about this terrible tendency for rapidity. I should like a further explanation of why the whole constitutional process must now move in a matter of hours rather than a matter of days.

An Hon. Senator: A good point.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we have listened with interest to the views expressed by Senator Macquarrie. I am sure that he, being of Scottish descent, might consider it to be appropriate that we begin this historic debate on St. Andrew's Day. However, be that as it may, there is no suggestion that we engage in a process involving unseemly haste.

Honourable senators, the party leadership in the other place is discussing how the motion may be disposed of in the elected chamber. The debate could go on for several more days over there. We still do not know what the final agreement will be, or if, in fact, it will be possible to achieve an agreement. All we have been discussing here is the manner in which the Senate shall dispose of this motion when it arrives in our chamber. There is no suggestion that the debate in the Senate should commence now before additional opinion has been heard by Parliament from various parts of the country. It is felt by many honourable senators that because of the importance of this measure the debate in the Senate should commence as soon as possible after the matter has been disposed of in the Commons—recognition perhaps of the importance of this proposed measure to Canada and also of the importance of the proposed motion in the view of the Senate. These are the reasons.

If the honourable senator is attempting to read into our proposals some dark or hidden meaning, I can tell him that we have negotiated in an open way—in the same manner that achieved agreement when the earlier resolution was before the Senate and which has since been revised rather extensively. We felt it might be useful again to have an order of the Senate along the same lines; but the order would not come into effect until the process had been completed in the other place.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I appreciate the geniality and the generality of my honourable friend's reply.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

He has invoked St. Andrew's Day, and I have been thinking of it for weeks and getting ready for it; but despite that, I will be here on Monday evening, if necessary. My Scottish forebears were not given to the suggestion, which I believe the honourable leader is making, that, in reference to the other place, we not only agree with them but we agree with them before they have stated their case. We should at least wait until they have made their point and then we might disagree with them. What will we be doing on Monday evening under Government Orders if they are not, in fact, finished?

Senator Perrault: This is an extremely active government, and there will be work for honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, for the sake of the record, since it is my motion, I would say that if I withdraw the motion we shall sit tomorrow and then on Monday at 2 p.m., and so on, through to Friday. As to the suggestion that we might be rushing things, I gave notice today, four days in advance, that we plan to meet on Monday night. The other reasons are those that we have explained, and I do not think there is any disagreement about them.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I am interested in the discussion that has taken place. I welcome the information that it is not proposed to debate this important resolution until after the debate has been concluded in the other place. I commend whoever is responsible for that decision.

● (1425)

There is one point in the discussion that disturbs me, and it is the proposition that there be a time limitation on the debate in this chamber. I think many people are very relieved that the resolution has come to the stage it has through a process which is an improvement over the earlier one. I refer to the fact that since it came before us last March the resolution has been dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada, meetings have been held with the provinces, and it is now supported by most of them. While purists may argue about the number of provinces supporting the resolution, the fact is that we are now dealing with a resolution which most of the provinces support. Also, there is no indication that I am aware of that there is any will here to obstruct the passage of the resolution or to delay it in any way. On the contrary, there is willingness to get on with the discussion.

I would hate to see any time limitation put on the debate on the resolution for two reasons, each of which is very important as far as I am concerned. One reason is that the only purpose I can see for the imposition of a time limitation on the debate would be to curtail debate, and I would not wish to see the views of any senator who wished to express them cut off by a time limitation. I think we all wish to hear any senator who cares to express his or her views. The other reason is one which also bothers me considerably. It has to do with the fact that this Constitution package is very important. We are bringing to Canada from another jurisdiction the final remnants of our Constitution and are also drastically changing it. The changes in the Constitution are far-reaching in our approach to parliamentary government.

Honourable senators, I do not want to appear on the record—a record which will remain in print for a long time and which will be read, I hope, by a great many in this country—with regard to something as important as this event the indication that changes as fundamental as the two changes involved here were not fully dealt with or fully debated by this house. I would hope that we could avoid imposing a time limitation on the debate, and that we could act expeditiously in dealing with the resolution without resorting to such an order.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, in response to the Leader of the Government's invitation to honourable senators to express their points of view, I would like to raise two matters on which he could perhaps give us his view. It seems to me, from what the Leader of the Government has said, that it is still uncertain whether the debate on the resolution in the other place will be completed, and whether the resolution will be available to the Senate, by Monday evening. I am wondering if the government leader has given consideration to not changing our time schedule until we know when that resolution will come to this chamber. Were the house to sit on Tuesday afternoon and Tuesday evening, it would amount to the same time spent in the chamber as if we were to sit on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon and not on Tuesday evening, which is the usual practice if we sit the evening before.

By adopting this approach, if consideration of the resolution were not completed in the other place by Monday, this chamber would not be left without that particular matter for which it would be convening. Certainly, in this event the time could be filled with routine business, but that would not be a necessity. It would merely be a matter of expediency, of killing time by filling it with routine business because the Senate had met a day earlier than normal.

So, my first point is: Will the Leader of the Government consider adjourning until Tuesday afternoon and sitting on Tuesday evening as well, rather than adjourning until Monday evening? In this way there would be a better chance of not having to face the situation arising from the resolution not being disposed of in the other place until some time on Monday afternoon or evening. Certainly, it would not be considered undue delay if this house began debating the resolution the following day.

• (1430)

My second point arises from what Senator McIlraith has said. I think we can all agree with him that there should not be any curtailment of debate. On the other hand, I do not think it would be in the public interest to drag this debate on any longer than is necessary to give all honourable senators wishing to express a position on it the opportunity of doing so.

I suggest that there would be some disadvantage in not having an understanding as to when the debate will terminate. I cannot see just letting it drift on until we reach the point where no one else wishes to speak and the vote is put. In those circumstances it could be that almost a third of the senators would not know the vote was to take place at the particular time and you might invite unnecessary criticism.

I think we should be able to agree in advance that the vote will be taken at the end of a particular day's sitting, whether next Wednesday or even Thursday. Then everyone concerned would know when the vote was to be taken. In that eventuality perhaps it would be desirable to add an extra day before that termination date to give ample time for all honourable senators wishing to speak. If the debate concluded prior to the time agreed upon for the termination of debate and the vote, that would present no problem because other matters could be debated until the time for the vote was reached. It would at least have the benefit of ensuring that no one could say afterwards that he had been denied the opportunity to speak.

To reiterate, my first suggestion is to sit, not on Monday evening but on Tuesday afternoon and Tuesday evening, if it is considered desirable. My second suggestion is to set a termination date, if that is agreeable to all honourable senators, which would be, at the earliest, Wednesday evening of next week, assuming the debate begins right at the first of the week, but preferably adding another day, even if that extra day were not taken up with debate, because then at least everyone would have the chance to speak.

I think we would all agree that it would be far better for the Senate to turn to other matters of business for a couple of hours before the vote was taken than to have the vote taken and then have someone afterwards say he did not have the opportunity he felt he should have to speak on an issue of such importance.

I should acknowledge to the Leader of the Government that I have a personal interest in this from one standpoint. It so happens that I have a long-standing public commitment, which I made over six weeks ago, requiring me to be out west on Monday evening. I cannot possibly return to Ottawa before Tuesday evening. That, in itself, presents no problem, but it means that there would be the added advantage to me of being able to hear most of the debate if it did not start until Tuesday afternoon or Tuesday evening.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we are finding confirmation of the fact that there are many sides to every question.

With respect to the particulars of my motion, it is true that the Senate's normal sitting days could be described as being Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. The fact is that the sitting days, according to the rules, are Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday at 2 o'clock. The impression I have from sitting here is that we have adopted the practice of sitting on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday because we find we can normally clean up our business in that length of time.

As I explained, the reason for suggesting meeting on Monday, not at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, as provided for in the rules, but at 8 o'clock in the evening, is that it looks quite likely that we will have this important piece of business, the constitutional resolution, to deal with next week.

On that basis, I discussed the matter with the Leader of the Opposition. We agreed that Monday evening would better serve our purposes than Monday at 2 o'clock or tomorrow at 2 o'clock, and in that respect, of course, it is possible that the debate in the other place could be concluded today. In fact it was with that in mind that we chose Monday evening. Usually, when important business is coming to us, or there is a good chance that it will, we extend our sittings to look after it.

As to the suggestion of a termination date, I cannot add much to what has already been said by the Leader of the Opposition. The original intention was to begin debating here before the Commons had finished. If there are many senators who feel that we should have a considerable amount of debate on the resolution, then we could revert to that idea and begin the debate tomorrow. However, when we spoke in terms of waiting until the Commons had finished before beginning our debate it was in the context, as Senator Flynn put it, of knowing when we would start and when we would finish, which is an important consideration. It was for that reason that we decided not to begin until they had finished and to have a clear date that all senators would recognize as concluding the debate.

I am not suggesting there is no merit in the view that the debate should be open-ended or have no limit; I am simply saying that there are good reasons for making an agreement based on the consideration Senator Flynn mentioned, namely, that we should know when we are starting and when we are finishing. We have mentioned three days as a reasonable period. If that is not sufficient, perhaps we could begin the debate today or tomorrow, as we originally intended. If that is the consensus or feeling, perhaps we should begin the debate on the resolution immediately.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: A question was asked of the Leader of the Government and the deputy leader by Senator Macquarrie and it has not been answered. Why is the government in such a hurry to give passage to this legislation that it wants to set a limit of three days and immediately put it to a vote? You have not replied to the question asked by Senator Macquarrie. Why such haste?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there seems to be a suggestion that there is some hidden motive for this government action. Let me remind honourable senators that in a most amicable way we agreed many weeks ago, when the original motion was before both houses, to a three-day debate, after estimating the number of senators who wished to speak to this motion, either in opposition or in government. We agreed that there was great merit in establishing a precise time for the vote.

Senator Asselin: Why?

Senator Perrault: Giving a degree of certainty—

Senator Asselin: Why?

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Perrault: So that honourable senators could be in their places for the vote. They would know when the amendments were going to be grouped for vote, as is frequently done in the other place.

When this agreement was originally being worked out, at no time was anyone's motive questioned. We felt there was merit in knowing when the debate was to begin, so that honourable senators who wished to could participate in the debate, and in knowing when the debate was to conclude.

Today we are not involved in the process of saying that next Tuesday afternoon the Senate will charge ahead and that there will be a vote on the motion at 6 o'clock. We are putting in place a mechanism, a procedure for disposing of the motion in an efficient, fair and democratic way. That is all we are doing.

The debate in the other place could go on for days. We do not know what will happen there. I am sure that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition has been in continuous contact with his leader in the other place. I have done the same with respect to our leadership, and I understand that negotiations involving the Liberal, Conservative and New Democratic parties are continuing today to determine the best way to dispose of the motion over there. That is all we are attempting to do here. We are attempting to put in place a procedure which will become operative when a decision has been reached in the other place.

Senator Flynn: Just as a means of trying to reconcile the different viewpoints, may I suggest that the scenario for the debate, if I may refer to it that way, or the order or the agreement, if you prefer, should be debated as the first item of business after the resolution has passed the other place? If we did that, we would have the advantage of knowing exactly what everyone wanted and we could better assess whether we needed three, four or five days for debate. It seems to me that many of our problems would already have been resolved and, generally speaking, we would know how many issues remained contentious.

That is what we had in mind in suggesting that there should be a certain number of days for debate, or in suggesting that we should determine the last day of debate and the day of the vote in the Senate. I think what is more important at this time is to know, first, that we will not begin the debate in this house before the other place has made its decision and, secondly, that we will not decide exactly the scenario here before that decision has been made. At that time, if it appears we are to have many speakers, because there remain many matters to discuss, then we could say the vote will not take place before four or five days, or whatever we determine at that time. It seems to me that if the government is not really saying we have to pass it on a certain day, then we, on this side, can certainly determine the time we need to do justice to the questions which will be before us.

• (1440)

As for what Senator Manning has raised, I have no problem with sitting on either Monday evening or Tuesday afternoon. There have been occasions when we have sat on a Tuesday afternoon, and, by agreement, kept an item on the agenda for that evening so that honourable senators who could not be present in the afternoon could register their attendance in the evening. If the resolution is passed by the other place by Monday evening, and we begin the debate on Tuesday, it is quite obvious that we would be debating from two to six o'clock, and from eight to ten o'clock, at least.

I should like to remind honourable senators that under our rules there is no time set for adjournment in the evenings. If there are many speakers the Senate could be forced to continue sitting during the night. It has happened before, but I hope it will not happen this time.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I hate taking part in procedural debates because they are usually futile and nearly always too long, but if the Leader of the Government would accept the most excellent suggestion made by our illustrious colleague, Senator Manning, that the motion be amended to read Tuesday afternoon instead of Monday evening, we will find complete unanimity and we will go forward together.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if the motion is available for debate in the Senate on Tuesday, would it be the inclination of the house to complete the debate by voting on Thursday afternoon, even if it means sitting extended hours? I understand that there are time constraints in the United Kingdom. There is a degree of certainty being sought, both here and there, as to when this measure is going to be dealt with finally by this Parliament.

Senator Asselin: That has been the same argument for two years.

Senator Frith: We have been hearing your "What's the rush?" for two years, too.

Senator Perrault: Serious consideration will certainly be given to the proposal advanced by Senator Manning, supported by Senator Macquarrie, for a sitting of the Senate on Tuesday. Then we could consider scheduling a vote for six o'clock on Thursday evening. Does this idea have some appeal for honourable senators?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, could we not adjourn until Tuesday with the understanding that, if the debate was concluded in the House of Commons, the Speaker would summon us back Monday evening?

Senator Frith: I understand the considerations that have been raised by honourable senators. I am sure they will all understand too that the government has to consider the question of the length of time for debate. What conclusion it comes to is, of course, another matter, and it would be preferable if we could settle it on the basis of agreement. I could even withdraw my motion and reintroduce it after we have had a chance to consider it.

Senator Perrault: I would suggest further discussion with the opposition.

Senator Frith: I feel that we have to know when the debate is going to end. How much time it should occupy is another matter, but I feel that the government leadership has an obligation to consider that in any event, and that is why we should postpone this motion for the moment, and see if we can come up with something that takes into account the various views that have been expressed. I suggest that we defer the vote on this motion.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS CONCERNING CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS—QUESTION WITHDRAWN

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I withdraw the question I asked on Thursday, November 19.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

ACCESS TO INFORMATION BILL—PROPOSED COMMITTEE PRE-STUDY

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, if there are no questions from the official opposition, I have a question to ask of Senator Goldenberg in his capacity as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

I have for some time been interested in the subject of freedom of information. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, of which I am joint chairman, had this matter referred to them some years ago. I noticed a full page article in the Sunday Star on November 22 by Professor Donald C. Rowat who actually appeared before our committee four or five years ago to give expert evidence. The headline of that article reads:

Freedom of information bill "too restrictive": Some exemptions go against the spirit of accountability and secrecy will be strengthened in some areas, expert says.

On April 15 I asked Senator Goldenberg whether or not his committee would start a pre-study of the Access to Information Bill. I had previously written to him on March 31. Since that time I have had various conversations with him. In fact, the committee met for a short while, I believe, on May 21 to discuss this question, and it has had only one meeting since, and that was on June 23. If we wait until this highly technical bill is passed by the House of Commons, and comes here, we will not have had the proper length of time in which to give it adequate consideration. At this point, we should be able to make some kind of contribution.

Since I am not getting very far with Senator Goldenberg in my private conversations with him, I am going public again and asking him what he intends to do about having a pre-study of this bill so that the Senate can make a proper contribution.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I am fully aware of Senator Godfrey's interest. He has mentioned it to me several times. I want to assure Senator Godfrey that I have pursued the matter, and was advised as recently as the day before yesterday that it would not be convenient for the officials whom we require as witnesses to appear at this stage while the bill is still before the house committee.

Senator Godfrey: I have a supplementary question. I do not think the Senate is run at the convenience of the bureaucrats. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for years has been studying the subject matter of legislation still before the House of Commons. It is nine months since I approached Senator Goldenberg about this. His committee has met for a total of one hour and ten minutes in the meantime, and I think it is about time we got a little action.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I explained the last time when Senator Godfrey raised this matter that I did not think it appropriate to start a pre-study of a bill which was going to be subjected to a great number of amendments in the course of the hearings before the house committee. This is what happened. If I remember correctly, I believe there have been about 60 amendments. I repeat what I have just said, and my information, for the benefit of Senator Godfrey, does not come from the bureaucrats.

Senator Godfrey: That is even less reason why the committee should be governed by whatever minister has the conduct of this bill.

• (1450)

Hon. G. I. Smith: I suppose, honourable senators, that I should do what I am going to do by way of addressing a question to Senator Goldenberg, so I will try to form it as a question.

Does Senator Goldenberg really believe that committees of this house should be operated according to the convenience of bureaucrats or of ministers who might be interested, or does he believe that they should be operated according to the requirements of the Senate?

Senator Goldenberg: I am very pleased that Senator Smith is interested in my beliefs.

My answer is this: The officials cannot appear before the Senate committee at the same time, or on the same days, as they are appearing before the Commons committee, which is what would happen. The house committee is hearing them. They have to be there all the time, I am told. It is a highly complicated measure that has been before the Commons committee for a long time, and I do not think it would serve any purpose for us to start a pre-study at a time when the people who would be called upon to appear before us and explain the measure to us would not be able to do so.

For the benefit of the members of the committee I have made inquiries as to other bills with which the government intends to proceed. Yesterday I advised Senator Flynn, with whom I consult very frequently on the work of our committee, that there are two bills with which the government intends to proceed. I intend to meet with the steering committee of the committee next week to discuss which bill we should proceed with. It will not be the bill concerning access to information.

Senator Smith: I have a supplementary question. I can understand that even Senator Goldenberg himself might have difficulty being in two places at the same time, and I appreciate that he could not expect any more of the officials, but is he saying that the officials attend meetings of the commons committee every day on which it is convenient for the Senate committee to meet?

Senator Goldenberg: I did not say anything of the kind, but I assume, having had some experience, as Senator Smith has had, of the workings of committees, that when officials appear before the committee questions may be put to them that they have to look into before the next meeting, and so the officials are tied up. I am not making a defence of officials, but I am trying to be practical, and I think the members of the committee should be reasonable in their approach, particularly if they have followed the hearings of the house committee. I think there are 60 or 65 reports already of the hearings. I have been following them, in the interests of our committee.

CANADA

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SPEECH BY PRIME MINISTER AT FUND-RAISING DINNER IN VANCOUVER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

On Tuesday evening of this week the Prime Minister, speaking in Vancouver, said that the people of British Columbia were terribly unaware of what is happening in this country. As a resident of the Atlantic coast, and in this day of rapid communications, I find it difficult to believe that the residents of British Columbia are ill-informed on Canada. This is particularly inconceivable when we consider the sources of information that they have, such as Senator Perrault, Senator

[Senator Godfrey.]

Austin, and their cronies and fellow Trudeautes such as Jack Webster and Allan Fotheringham. In those circumstances, I would expect that the people of British Columbia are very well informed.

I would ask the Leader of the Government to explain to the chamber what particular aspect of the Canadian mosaic the Vancouver residents fail to understand.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was present at that dinner. I had the honour to introduce the Prime Minister. He made a remarkable speech.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We agree on that!

Senator Perrault: The Right Honourable the Prime Minister spoke to the largest political fund-raising dinner ever held in the province of British Columbia—an indication of the increasing degree of support which exists on the west coast for the Liberal Party, and the esteem in which the Prime Minister is held there.

I will make an earnest endeavour to obtain a full text of the remarks of the Prime Minister for the honourable senator so that he can read every paragraph and understand the message the Prime Minister conveyed to those who live in Canada's westernmost province.

One of the highlights of his speech related to federal-provincial relations—for example, support for post-secondary education. In the province of British Columbia, for example, the federal government pays 70 per cent of the cost of post-secondary education, the province only 30 per cent.

The Prime Minister made an eloquent statement on the need for a strong central government. He suggested that in certain areas the pendulum had gone too far in the direction of provincial power. I am sure that if the honourable senator had been there he would have had great difficulty in restraining his applause for that statement, because I know the honourable senator is a good Canadian.

There were many other sections of the speech which attracted a good deal of interest, but the significant point the Prime Minister was attempting to make was that none of us must be caught up in a regionalism which ignores the good of the country, and the need to build a strong nation. The Prime Minister delivered a powerful message that has a relevance, whether delivered in British Columbia, the prairies, Ontario, Quebec, the Territories or the Atlantic provinces.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I can understand now, after that reply, why the people of British Columbia so wisely failed to elect a Liberal in the last election.

Are the Prime Minister's remarks an indication that the federal government plans to initiate a new federal advertising program on the west coast?

Senator Perrault: I think, honourable senators, that, not without reason, the federal government feels that some of its efforts on behalf of Canadians are not properly understood in many sections of the country. If the government did initiate a program to enlighten people regarding matters affecting them in the regions in which they live, one could well understand the rationale.

For example, my home province of British Columbia, during the past 13 years, has received significant contributions from the federal government, much of it unacknowledged by the provincial government. Federal investments in British Columbia, and in the Atlantic provinces, have been of substantial proportions. I must be frank, and say that I do not believe that at times federal governments have been properly credited with the role they have played in building stronger and better economies in Canada's regions. I would certainly support, in the interests of open government, the development of better information services regarding federal programs.

Senator Phillips: Another supplementary, if I may, honourable senators.

Newspaper reports quote people leaving the meeting as saying that the remarks were garbage from a senile old man. Honourable senators, it is my understanding that Senator Perrault and Senator Austin also addressed the meeting. The articles do not identify the individual described as a senile old man. Would the honourable senator care to identify that individual?

Senator Perrault: It may have been that one of our political opponents inadvertently or accidentally wandered into the hall and made a random comment at some point during the proceedings, but certainly I can recall a standing ovation being given the Right Honourable the Prime Minister after his speech. It was a frank speech, but anyone who describes the Prime Minister in unflattering terms really does not understand very much about him, I am afraid, or what the country is all about.

• (1500)

Senator Phillips: Did anybody mention the Prime Minister?

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the same minister. I listened with rapt attention and immense approval to all of the nuances in the exchange between the two. Indeed, the minister might be a candidate for the kind of job he suggested could be done. No one could make a better silk purse out of a coarser sow's ear. However, if he is suggesting that my very candid colleague, Senator Phillips, would have paid $150 for that, I think he is quite wrong. I do commend him for his précis, but particularly for the adjective he used. It was a "remarkable" speech. I understand that a great many remarks were made about that speech in British Columbia. In fact, I could almost hear some of those remarks, they were so loud and fervent.

I would like, however, to react to the information theme. I have tried to give the minister information on more than one occasion. I have done my best to enlighten him, but he has not always co-operated. That brings me to the meeting which was just concluded in Halifax. I told the minister that the provincial treasurers were all upset about the budget. The meeting in Halifax indicated that not only the representatives of the poorer provinces but also those of the affluent provinces are totally opposed to this. I told him that the whole question of education and the care of the aged is very much up in the air.

I wonder if he, as an insider of the government, can tell me what is to be done to salvage the serious situation which is facing both the young people and the elderly all across the country, as was so eloquently expressed by their representatives in Halifax.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, first I would like to point out that however much certain senators seem to relish a discussion of the marvelously well-attended dinner in Vancouver, I understand that the Conservative Party of Canada was forced to cancel a similar fund-raising dinner for their leader because of lack of support in Vancouver. I am told that there was no possibility of organizing a similar function for the Leader of the Conservative Party.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Where?

Senator Perrault: Recently in Vancouver. Senator Murray may know of the acute embarrassment caused to his party in British Columbia.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Senator Murray says, for the record, that what the minister has just stated is absolutely untrue and without foundation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Let me tell honourable senators that the Prime Minister who now serves this nation—and has served it for 13 years, but for one brief, unfortunate interruption of a few months—will go down in history as one of the greatest prime ministers we have had in this country.

An Hon. Senator: Is this a eulogy?

Senator Perrault: It is not a eulogy; it is a statement of fact. When the history books are written, Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau will be recorded as having been one of the greats in Canadian history. Not only that, he will be acknowledged to be one of the few Canadian prime ministers able to achieve an international reputation as one of the world's great statesmen. Therefore, I think this recital of rumours today by the official opposition hardly enhances the reputation of the official opposition.

Let me make this reply to the Honourable Senator Macquarrie. For weeks we have heard this continuing attack that somehow the government is trying to cut back on medical services and on aid for post-secondary education. The increase in medical aid, in hospital aid and in aid to education—which I think will be confirmed by my colleague, Senator Olson—will be from $11 billion to almost $20 billion over four fiscal years. These are the facts. Regardless of what Senator Macquarrie has been saying in the Senate for weeks, the fact is that in his own province the federal government pays 110 per cent of all costs of post-secondary education, and in British Columbia 70 per cent. We are told time and time again that this is the hard-hearted, skinflint federal government trying to cut back on spending. Let me tell you this: It is time we brought into balance the provincial and federal responsibilities in this country.

Senator Guay knows about his own province of Manitoba taking money, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, attacking the federal government for an alleged parsimonious attitude. It is time to call a halt to that. It is time the people were given an opportunity to know the facts. There has been a diminution of the provincial role in many of these programs, with the federal government assuming more and more of that responsibility, incurring deficits in its efforts to help the people and then being attacked by those Conservatives in provincial governments for overspending and profligacy.

You cannot have it both ways. It is about time the government fought back against this continuing attack by the official opposition. I say to you that if one looks in any kind of an objective way at this budget, one will see that it is a generous budget which is indicative of the social conscience of the Liberal Party.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I, like a lot of near saints down through the ages, am being falsely accused. I was not talking about the meeting in British Columbia. I was not spreading rumours or scandal. I was simply responding to the performance of the Leader of the Government here. I say that I note his adulation, and I just want to put on the record that I am old enough to remember when Liberals used to praise Mackenzie King. That is all I have to say about that.

I am also falsely accused when it is suggested that I am spreading rumours or castigations about the Minister of Finance. I was not in Halifax, but all of the provincial treasurers were. All of them say that this is a diminution of services in the very important area of universities; it is not Senator Macquarrie at all. I think I would be a poor senator and a poor Canadian, however, if I were not sensitized by the complaints, the anguish of these people. I ask the minister not to enjoy himself in castigating me—he can do that any day—but to try to do something about this as a member of the government.

Senator Perrault: Let me tell you what some of these provincial allegations are all about. At the present time, post-secondary education in this country is supported by the provincial governments on an average of 37 per cent, which is well down from the 50 per cent figure which was established some time ago as a "target". This is what some of the provincial treasurers describe as a "reduction in federal support". The post-secondary financial support trend line shows provincial contributions beginning at 50 per cent and sagging ever downward—

Senator Murray: That looks like your Gallup poll!

Senator Perrault: —and the federal contributions, which started at 50 per cent, are dramatically rising upward. What do they describe as a cutback in their contribution from the federal government? They have projected this federal contribution "trend line" ever upward. It is proposed to level off the "trend" slightly. Some provincial treasurers claim that because it is being levelled off, though it is still ascending, this represents a "reduction" in federal support.

Senator Macquarrie has been around government long enough to know that this is no "reduction" at all. The federal government is saying that if we keep on contributing the way we have been, yes, the provinces would be getting money for post-secondary education over the next few years, but we propose a lower rate of increase. We have to bring this thing into balance. Yet some of the provincial treasurers describe this process in terms of "cutbacks". They are not "cutbacks" at all. Senator Olson has all of the figures in his book—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know how diligently and ably my cabinet colleagues have worked to preserve these programs and to make it possible for aid to be given to post-secondary education in this country. It is time to put the facts on the table and let the people of this country know what has been going on, as the Minister of Finance has been doing in Halifax this week.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I thank the minister for his defence of the Minister of Finance in Halifax and for his praise of the Prime Minister in Vancouver, and I accept them both with the same degree of credibility and credulity.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Olson would open his books and put them on the table.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN— NOTICE OF MOTION RESPECTING DISPOSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might interrupt Question Period briefly to give you some news with regard to the schedule next week. We propose that we sit on Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock instead of on Monday evening at 8 o'clock. I shall now give notice of a motion for a Senate order as to how we shall deal with the debate. We can then debate that, and honourable senators will have a chance to think about it. We can debate that on Tuesday. If we have the constitutional resolution in our hands, we will want to discuss how we are going to deal with it. If not, we can still discuss this because it is not based on a particular day but on a number of days after the motion is voted on in the other place.

● (1510)

So the notice would be as follows:

That the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution, notice of which was given by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., on November 19, 1981, be disposed of as follows:

1. On the first sitting day—

If I may pause to explain certain expressions as I am going through this, when I use the term "sitting day", if the other place settled the matter on a Friday we would not sit on the Saturday. It would be a sitting day, which, according to our rules, would be Monday through Friday. To continue:

1. On the first sitting day following the final disposition by the House of Commons of the motion for an Address to the Queen moved by the Minister of Justice on November 20, 1981, the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., shall move the motion of which he gave notice on November 19, 1981—

Then I have added words to give effect to Senator Flynn's excellent suggestion:

—with such modifications as may be necessary to make it conform to the resolution adopted by the House of Commons; and

2. At six o'clock p.m. on the second sitting day—

That is three days, because it is the second sitting day after Senator Perrault has moved the motion referred to in paragraph 1.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): To say "after the day" would make it clear.

Senator Frith: Yes, that would make it clear:

At six o'clock p.m. on the second sitting day after the day the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., has moved the motion referred to in paragraph 1, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and put all questions necessary to dispose of the said motion.

So we shall discuss on Tuesday the suggestion that we have a Senate order providing that once the House of Commons has finally disposed of the motion, we shall commence our debate the next day, that the debate shall proceed for three consecutive days, and that on the third day the vote shall be taken at 6 o'clock p.m.

We are required to give two days' notice of that. That is a good idea because it gives honourable senators an opportunity to think about it. I should add that those three days would provide us with the possibility of having six so-called sessions. In other words, we could sit both afternoon and evening on the three consecutive days.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): If honourable senators consent to this change to my notice of motion, that we meet next Tuesday at 2 p.m., the motion can be put, and I will put this forward as a notice of motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: Let us put the question on the motion for adjournment.

Senator Frith: That is what I have asked for, but the Senate must agree to the change to my notice of motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, December 1, 1981, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN— NOTICE OF MOTION RESPECTING DISPOSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I now give notice of the motion. Can we dispense with my reading it again?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The Deputy Leader of the Government is merely giving notice; but I should mention that we should not be called upon to finally adopt the motion before the resolution is passed in the other place, because, as I have already said, we have to assess the situation as it exists when we have the resolution before us. If all the problems in the other place have been solved, we might not need three days of debate. We might even be willing to shorten the debate. That is one point. My second point is that I cannot see that we should necessarily decide to terminate debate at 6 o'clock. We might find it necessary to continue until 10 o'clock at night.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on those two points, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that it will be helpful if we know what the situation is before we vote on it. I do not want to be held to that, in case we find it necessary to vote otherwise; but I agree with the principle of the Leader of the Opposition, that ideally we should know exactly how we stand when we vote on it.

Senator Flynn: We might look silly if we decide in advance that we are going to take three days without knowing exactly what will come to us.

Senator Frith: As the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, it may be that we can deal with the matter in less than three days. That is another reason why it would be helpful to have the information before us. On the second point, I agree that we can amend it to a time other than 6 o'clock. Let us leave it at that for the moment, but that could be part of our debate.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Reverting to Question Period, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I should say that occasionally, when we on this side prepare for Question Period, I say, "Please don't put too vague a question to the Leader of the Government if you don't want to invite a speech"; but I suppose today's experience will be another warning. It is very difficult to get a simple answer to any question that we put to him.

In any event, my question is a simple one, and he can either give a short answer or make a speech. I wonder if the government has any official comment on Mr. Lévesque's decision yesterday to advise the Prime Minister of Canada that the Province of Quebec is registering its veto on the constitutional resolution.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): No.

Senator Flynn: No comment! That is much better than what Mr. Chrétien said on television yesterday.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a supplementary. Could the government leader indicate whether a decision will be taken by the government on the matter of an answer to the Premier of Quebec on the right of veto? Will he get an official reply?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there has been no official letter or communication from the Premier of Quebec on this point, and I hardly think he can expect an official reply if he has not communicated in any official way.

Senator Flynn: We have seen the letter and the photocopy of the order in council as it appeared in the press. Is there any problem with the Office of the Prime Minister?

Senator Perrault: I was advised this afternoon that there has been no official request received from the office of the Premier of Quebec—certainly so far as Mr. Chrétien's office is concerned, and, of course, he plays a leading role in this matter. We have no information about any communication. If, in fact, material has subsequently been received from the office of the Premier of Quebec, that information will be duly brought to the chamber. There may be documents around, but I have been advised that there has been no official communication.

Senator Flynn: We saw yesterday the letter to the Prime Minister dated November 25, 1981, signed by Mr. Lévesque. Are you suggesting that the Prime Minister has not received that letter?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a communication was made with the office of the Honourable Jean Chrétien at approximately 1.45 this afternoon to ask whether any official information had been received from the office of the Premier of Quebec on this point, and the answer was no. If the record must be corrected, I will be pleased to do so; but the information was expressly sought for today's Question Period.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I think that the Leader of the Government should enquire especially at the Prime Minister's office because it was stated yesterday, and everyone has confirmed it, that Mr. Normand, the deputy minister of interprovincial affairs for Quebec, met with Mr. Kirby at the Prime Minister's office to deliver by hand the letter and the document in question.

Did the Leader of the Government ask whether that is how it happened?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice. If there has been any further information in recent hours, that will be acknowledged and the information will be brought to the Senate. The inquiry was directed to the office of the Minister of Justice in this particular instance.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we get to delayed answers, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would expand a little on the eloquent address he delivered a moment ago on federal-provincial fiscal relations, because I believe he gave some information to the house that will not bear scrutiny. Did he not accuse the provincial treasury officials of exaggerating their position by projecting revenues and expenditures into the near future, the next five years, with respect to federal-provincial fiscal relations? I think he did. Honourable senators, the information we are working on in this connection has nothing to do with what the premiers said, but everything to do with what the Minister of Finance said. If one wishes to know the situation in which the Minister of Finance is placing the premiers, one need only look at one of his own documents.

• (1520)

I suggested to my honourable friend the last time we spoke on this subject that he look at the white paper prepared by the Government of Canada called Fiscal Arrangements in the Eighties—Proposals of the Government of Canada, and he would find that information set out on page 50 of that document. I ask the Leader of the Government whether he has ever studied that document and whether he has read the speech, and the documents attached to it, which the Minister of Finance gave to the provincial treasurers in Halifax the other day. Has he seen the confession of an error of $600 million in favour of the "feds" and against the provinces, if I can use that expression, which I now notice has been raised to $700 million? The actual position of the provinces is much worse off than that presented in the budget documents.

Is the Leader of the Government aware that in the same statement to the provincial treasurers in Halifax the Minister of Finance told them how much he was going to take from provincial taxpayers in addition to all this because of alterations that were being made to the budget that day? They amount to some $870 million for 1982-83, the first year of a five-year period.

In light of those facts, how could my honourable friend stand up in this house and make the statement he made a few minutes ago that the premiers and the provincial treasurers were exaggerating the situation, were not giving the facts, were padding the issue to reflect their own point of view, when, in fact, the issue is made plain by the documents of the federal government itself? I think there is something lacking in the leader's understanding of this situation.

Further, I would ask the Leader of the Government whether he has taken the trouble to acquaint himself with the contents of the document produced by the House of Commons Special Committee on Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and whether he is aware of the connection which it makes between the tax guarantee situation and the funds available for health care and post-secondary education, or its recommendation that those funds be considered as one sum in dealing with these matters. I am not trying to invent difficulties for the honourable leader, but I wish to point out to him what his own people, his own government and his own documents are saying in this matter so that we can get to some mutually agreed understanding of the facts.

I ask the Leader of the Government whether he accepts the facts outlined in the speech made by the Minister of Finance, the facts outlined in the budget documents and the statements contained in the report of the House of Commons Special Committee on Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements. If he does, then he and I will have common ground on which to debate, but, from his statements so far, that does not appear to me to be the case.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Answer "yes" or "no."

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin expresses a deep desire to get the facts on the table and, at least in that regard, we have an area of common agreement because we want to get the facts on the table as well. When I gave the figures in response to Senator Macquarrie's question, I was referring to medical programs and post-secondary education, for which the allocation is expected to increase from approximately $11 billion to approximately $19 billion over four fiscal years. That is the area to which I had addressed my remarks, and what I said is fact.

The official opposition has been saying for weeks that the government plans to make cutbacks, and they have organized a $20,000 advertising campaign, paid for by the Conservative Party, to mislead the students in the universities from coast to coast in this country. Is this the action of a responsible party interested in getting the facts on the table? To act in this manner is a classic act of irresponsibility on the part of the Conservative Party of Canada. I did not pad the figures to which I referred. I did say that it is time to get the facts on the table, that it is time to let the people of this country know about the significant contribution being made by the federal government to many good causes in this country, causes for which the federal government never receives credit.

Mr. MacEachen has said to the provinces, to paraphrase some of his remarks at these recent meetings, "Well, you have certain constitutional responsibilities in certain areas, such as education. It is time that you began to bear your fair share of the burden of some of those constitutional responsibilities." Does anyone really oppose the idea of a fair-sharing arrangement to fund post-secondary education? As the situation stands now, the provincial share is something like 37 per cent, and the federal government pays the rest.

Does Senator Macquarrie, who is an educator in his own right, deny that 110 per cent of all post-secondary education in Prince Edward Island is funded from federal sources? Does he think that is a fair deal? I wonder whether the federal government is receiving 110 per cent of the credit in Prince Edward Island for this degree of generosity?

I wonder if Senator Roblin can tell us the figures for the federal contribution to post-secondary education in Manitoba. Does he defend the diminution in the percentage of contribution by the provincial governments and an increase by the federal government? The Minister of Finance does not have a printing machine down in the basement.

Senator Roblin: Oh yes he does.

Senator Perrault: The minister cannot churn out currency and hand it out with profligacy to every provincial government in this country. The provincial government in my own province of British Columbia has brought up time and again how federal aid is being allegedly reduced. And what is their great provincial budget objective for this year? They say that they hope they can once again balance the budget. Just the other day the Government of British Columbia said that they think they will now have a several-hundred-million-dollar budgetary surplus. Of course, I realize that that is not the case in all of the provinces and that some of the provinces are wealthier than others.

However, because of the high federal deficit, the federal government is under attack by the opposition every single day in Parliament and throughout the country. Yet, every time the government attempts to balance programs which clearly have gone out of balance over the years, it is attacked for its parsimonious attitude. Senator Roblin stands up in a synthetic rage and accuses the federal government of cutting back, and says that the Minister of Finance is condemned by his own words. This is show business. Senator Roblin knows enough about government to appreciate the fact that any minister of finance, under these difficult circumstances, must take a look at all sorts of programs and make certain the taxpayers' interests are being protected.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have never heard such a rodomontade in recent days. I give my honourable friend credit for being able to obscure most issues pretty successfully, but he cannot obscure this one. He is a member of the government that decided the relationship between the provinces and the federal government with respect to these grants. He is a member of the administration that decided that no matter what the origin of these payments was, they would be changed into block grants. He knows perfectly well that when block grants were brought in there was no obligation placed on the Province of Prince Edward Island as to what it was to do with its block grant in order to fit some definition the "feds" had dreamed up. That is the precise reason why block grants were adopted. If my honourable friend wants to say that was a terrible mistake and the government wishes to change it, then that is fine. That is a perfectly fair thing to do—or, it may not be fair but at least it is legitimate.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It does not necessarily have to be a mistake to change it.

Senator Roblin: On the other hand, to blame the provinces for taking advantage of the block grants which my honourable friend and his colleagues recommended to the nation as being good, seems to me to be something less than a satisfactory explanation for what is being done.

The Leader of the Government talks about the federal deficit. I am one of those who would like to see that deficit brought under control, but I have never recommended, nor do I recommend now, that the federal government reduce its deficit by transferring those burdens to other jurisdictions. That is precisely what the Minister of Finance is doing. He is saying that the government will cut its deficit by transferring part of the tax burden to the provincial taxpayers. Does he think the nation is any better off because he has done that? Well, I certainly don't.

It does not matter to me which taxpayer is paying because I do not see how you can divide them up, but the government will say, "Look what we have done; we have reduced our deficit!" Of course, they will have reduced the deficit by transferring it to another governmental authority which has to raise the money instead. That is precisely what the government is doing, and it does not appeal to me as being economically feasible. If the government wishes to reduce the deficit, it can take measures other than transferring that deficit from one level of government to another.

That is the burden of some of the complaints that have been made with respect to the budgetary performance that we have witnessed in the past few days. If my honourable friend wants the government to get out of block grants, then that is something else, but it cannot now criticize provincial governments that have used those block grants in a perfectly legitimate, legal and moral fashion. If the government wishes to change the deal now, then it should negotiate, but to retrospectively blame others for something which it made possible seems to me to be slightly off the mark. For the government to say, "I am reducing the deficit by transferring at least part of its expense to somebody else," does not convince me that it is a statesman-like attitude towards the economic field.

● (1530)

Senator Perrault: I am amazed at the statement made by Senator Roblin. When he was Premier of Manitoba—and

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Guay recalls this well—he terminated all sorts of programs which he felt had become obsolete or unfair or unworkable.

Now the Government of Canada is saying that modifications are required in our approach to certain problems in this country. The government is saying that we should make changes. Is the Honourable Senator Roblin really suggesting that no program should ever have a “sunset” clause; that once a program is in place it should never be changed? Of course not! His own record would demonstrate that he made all sorts of changes in Manitoba when he was premier of that province.

What the federal government is saying is that there is a time in the development of this country when we must do some fundamental reassessing of these programs to determine whether or not the burden has been unfairly carried by one level of government or another.

We all know that, ultimately, the same taxpayer pays the taxes municipally, provincially and federally. Everyone is aware of that fact. But more and more in this country we have seen more of the taxes going to provincial and municipal governments, with more of the responsibility going to the federal government, however, to collect the moneys which are then diverted to the provincial governments.

The federal government is saying that the time has come to reassess its relationship with the provincial governments; to determine whether or not the federal government is getting most of the blame and none of the credit; to determine whether some of the programs are now obsolete. The block funding concept may have had relevancy, but perhaps it is time to modify that program, to change it. Surely, a quality of government which should be admired is willingness to reassess and change, when change is required. But this government is not willing to stand back and assume all the responsibility to collect vast revenues, with over 60 per cent of all the taxes now collected by the federal government being spent by municipal and provincial governments, with the federal government having total discretionary power over less than $20 million in today's budget.

Senator Roblin: Well, I am not going to indulge in any ad hominem arguments about what I did or did not do when I was Premier of Manitoba. I only hope that I did a better job than some of my friends opposite are doing at the present time.

Senator Olson: I don't think that is right.

Senator Roblin: Well, you don't think that is right.

Senator Olson: That would be an opinion we would not share.

Senator Roblin: All right. Well, I expressed the hope, but I think my honourable friends opposite are perhaps impervious to argument on that point. In any event, I do not intend to indulge in that kind of retrospective debate.

My point is simply that if you examine the origin of these enormous federal expenditures of which my honourable friend speaks, they were not made at the request of the provinces but on the initiative of the federal government. The federal government took the initiative in making these sums available for worthy public purposes, but when they did so they set in train an accumulation of financial consequences and responsibilities which really, in a sense, dictated the fiscal policies of the provinces to deal with them.

Anyone who was around at the time when those massive social changes were initiated will understand the weight of the argument I am making here. I am not saying they were necessarily all wrong. I don't think they were. I am saying, however, that they did change the financial structure of the country and they did impose financial burdens on other levels of government which had no real way of avoiding them. There was no way of backing out of these things from a practical point of view.

Against that background, it then seems a little unfair that the federal government should come along and say, “We started this ball rolling. It has had consequences we did not entirely anticipate and now we think we ought to change it. The way we are going to change it is by pushing back on to another level of government some of the financial responsibilities.”

It seems to me that that, in a nutshell, is an argument that has to be considered. I suggest to my honourable friend that if he would use the kind of moderate language that he employed in his last exchange with me, we would get along a lot better. It seems to me that he should recognize the justice of that particular approach to the matter, particularly by a provincial treasurer or, indeed, a provincial taxpayer.

It seems to me that the federal government has to exercise reasonable discretion so that it does not leave somebody else holding the baby for which it is responsible.

THE CONSTITUTION

CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS—PROTECTION OF FETUS—TELEGRAM FROM CARDINAL CARTER TO PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the telegram which His Eminence Cardinal Carter of Toronto sent to the Prime Minister requesting the affirmation of constitutional protection of the life of the fetus has been given any reply or consideration by the Prime Minister or by the Minister of Justice or by the cabinet.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I can confirm that the telegram has been received. I do not know whether a reply has been completed as yet, but it is in the process of formulation.

THE ECONOMY

ALBERTA—CANADIAN FORCES—IMPACT OF COST OF LIVING

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate having to do with the recent alarming news that Canadian Forces troops stationed in Calgary, Alberta, find themselves, in terms of their pay situation, in a position where they cannot meet the highly inflationary cost of living in that province.

While we can admire the wealthy economy of the province of Alberta, it certainly is creating a hardship for the troops, who, evidently, have to resort to welfare in order to meet today's needs.

Can the Leader of the Government extract from the Minister of National Defence an answer as to what action is being taken to overcome this serious problem in terms of regional disparity payments?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

QUEBEC—FINANCIAL AID TO INDUSTRIAL COMMISSIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on October 28 by Senator Tremblay concerning financial aid to industrial commissions.

It is a policy of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to promote local entrepreneurship and to provide support to local economic development agencies and organizations. In this context I am informed that the department will provide an estimated $2 million to $3 million for aid to be given to organizations in various regions of Quebec.

With reference to the honourable senator's second question, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is not necessarily considering the signing of a federal-provincial agreement under the General Development Agreement. However, we do not rule out the possibility of an agreement with the Quebec government which would be aimed at co-ordinating the federal government's assistance with the aid currently being provided by Quebec's Department of Industry, Trade and Tourism.

It is my understanding that during the past few years DREE representatives have held discussions with officials of the Quebec government in order to study the possibility of signing a federal-provincial agreement with respect to the provision of assistance to industrial commissions. However, an agreement has not yet been possible. At present, negotiations are not taking place between the two governments with respect to this matter. Instead, DREE has invited the Association of Industrial Commissions of Quebec to submit an official proposal which could be the focus of future discussions with the province.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

HONG KONG VETERANS—POSSIBLE PARASITIC INFESTATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to give a reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Marshall on November 9 concerning the possibility that Hong Kong veterans are affected by a parasitic infestation.

There have been a number of questions as well as media coverage regarding the possibility that some Hong Kong veterans may be subject to a parasitic disease. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has advised me that his officials are aware of the problem and of the experience of Australia and the United States in this matter. Arrangements are being made so that all Hong Kong veterans will be offered laboratory tests to determine whether the parasite is present. Each veteran will be contacted and will be given specific information as to what action he should take.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I want to thank the leader for that answer. There is one point I should make, however, and that is that that information was made known through other sources about four or five days ago. I should like to suggest that, in order to show that we in this chamber are concerned, it would be more appropriate if we tried to get the answers at the same time as they are given in the other place or at the same time as they have given through the media.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER WITHDRAWN

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, as far back as October 1980 I asked a series of questions having to do with the status of certain relocation projects from the National Capital Region. Those questions are now superfluous, if that is the correct word. Most of the information requested is now readily available. So, if I have the agreement of the house, I would ask that the questions be withdrawn from the Order Paper in order to avoid the expense of printing them.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 1, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 1, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., Hon. Renaude Lapointe, Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Supplementary Estimates (D) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of September 1981, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, Chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Memorandum of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of Nova Scotia, dated November 3, 1981, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, Chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970.

Notice of Ways and Means Motion to amend the Petroleum Administration Act, issued by the Department of Finance, dated November 27, 1981.

Report of the Public Service Staff Relations Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 115 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, Chapter P-35, R.S.C., 1970.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the supplementary estimates (D) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about this motion. It permits the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to meet while the Senate is sitting today. The chairman of that committee, Senator Hayden, has told me that witnesses will be appearing at 2.30 this afternoon, so he would like the meeting to commence as soon as possible after that time.

I mention that because, with the agreement of honourable senators, we will proceed immediately to debate the motion that is on the Order Paper concerning our procedure on the Constitution resolution, and we will postpone Question Period in order to do so. Caucuses are called for 4.30, and we hope to rise at that time to attend the caucuses, and then to resume at 8 o'clock this evening and take as much time as necessary to debate the procedural motion. From that standpoint, it is in the interest of the Senate, and in the interest of disposing of the procedural motion, to have Senator Hayden's committee commence its meeting as soon as possible so that members of that committee will be free to attend the caucuses, at which there will be discussions that will affect what takes place here this evening on the procedural motion.

The other advantage of the procedure, to which we have more or less agreed, is that those honourable senators who have not found it possible to attend this afternoon's sitting will be able to give us the benefit of their views on the procedural motion this evening.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I support Senator Hayden's motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN— NOTICE OF MOTION RESPECTING DISPOSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, following discussions with the Leader of the Opposition a few moments ago, it is suggested that we postpone Question Period and proceed to Motion No. 2 on today's Order Paper. Therefore, I ask honourable senators for permission to bring forward that motion and to deal with it immediately.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we have brought forward the motion that appears on page xxxiv of Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for Thursday, November 26, 1981.

The debate on this motion will take the same form as the introduction of the motion and the debate that took place on the procedure last week. In other words, we are interested in interventions and suggestions by honourable senators as to the best way to proceed.

Although I recognize that there are many alternative ways of dealing with this motion, I shall suggest three for consideration. The first is the one that now appears on the order paper.

The difference between the situation that existed last week and that which exists at present is that we now know when the House of Commons will vote on the motion before it. We did not know that last week. Last week we agreed to the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that the resolution we shall be called upon to debate should conform to the resolution approved by the House of Commons. That does not mean, of course, that it is not subject to motions for amendment in this chamber. It simply means that we will have before us exactly the same resolution as adopted in the other place.

We have been given to understand that the members of the other place will vote on the matter at 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. To be more precise, the voting will commence at 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon and, according to my information, it is anticipated that there will be more than one vote. Therefore, we will not be sure of the form of the resolution as passed by the House of Commons before 4 or 4.30 p.m.

If we insert dates in the notice of motion, it means that on Thursday next Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government, will move a motion in the same form as that approved in the other place. That would occur on the first day.

The second day would be Friday, and the vote would take place at 6 p.m. on the third sitting day, which would be Monday.

● (1410)

What we would like to spend some time on for a brief period this afternoon, again this evening and, I hope, during the caucuses, is the finding of a procedure that most senators will agree to. The procedure could be on extension beyond Monday of next week and could include, for example, a sitting next Monday, with voting on Tuesday. It could extend to sitting on Tuesday and voting on Wednesday, and so on. Those are the kinds of ranges that exist at the other end.

It seems to me that the shortest and most practical schedule—whether it would be desirable, of course, is a matter for honourable senators to decide—would be to introduce the motion tomorrow, once we know its form, because I think we have all agreed that we would prefer not to commence the debate until we know exactly in what form the resolution is adopted in the other place. We would incorporate any amendments accepted by the other place, and we would start with that document.

We could, therefore, introduce the motion tomorrow at 4 or 4.30 p.m.—or whenever we get the news of its having been agreed to in the other place—and commence the debate if there is time. On the other hand, we could simply stand the matter until the next day without any debate at that point. That would take us to Thursday.

We could have three sittings on Thursday—at 10 o'clock in the morning, 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and at 8 o'clock in the evening—followed by a sitting on Friday.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Is that this week?

Senator Frith: I am still talking about this week. We could then have the vote on Friday at 2 o'clock.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Why not Saturday? Why not Sunday?

Senator Frith: Why not? I am coming to that.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That is your option.

Senator Asselin: Your option is to get it done as soon as possible. I know that.

Senator Frith: Perhaps Senator Asselin did not hear what I was saying.

Senator Asselin: I did hear.

Senator Frith: I was simply giving what I thought was the earliest possibility. Saturday and Sunday are certainly within the range that we can talk about.

An Hon. Senator: Forget it.

Senator Frith: I am not suggesting that.

Those are the ranges we are talking about. It seems to me that the soonest practical time for us to debate this motion, and to have the vote, would be on the basis of introducing it tomorrow and debating it in three sittings on Thursday and one sitting on Friday.

Introduction of the motion tomorrow is not that important. We could agree to introduce it on Thursday. It might, indeed, be useful to look at it overnight. I do not recommend, or see any reason for, any extensive debate on it tomorrow.

As I say, that would seem to me to be the most prompt way of dealing with this motion. Let me now extend what I have said a little. We could have the vote at 2 o'clock on Friday afternoon. What is the advantage of that? The only advantage of voting at 2 o'clock on Friday afternoon is a practical one from the point of view of honourable senators who live at the extreme ends of the country, because if we are going to vote on Friday it would be a convenience to them if the vote were held early in the afternoon. We could, however, postpone the vote until 6 o'clock on Friday evening. It seems to me, however, that when we get to that point, the attractiveness of lengthening the debate on Friday is less obvious.

We could sit on Saturday, and possibly on Sunday. They are not sitting days. I have talked throughout of sitting days, and I do not see any reason why we should consider Saturday or Sunday, but if some honourable senators want to consider those days I am sure they understand that they are free to do so.

We come then to the possibility, as I say, of sitting on Monday, and that would be the practical result of the present notice of motion. I have another observation to make about that. It seems to me that if we decide to continue on Monday, we would do better to amend the present motion to provide for a vote at some time during the evening, because if we talk about proceeding at 6.00 p.m. on Monday, we must remember that the senators who live at the extremities of the country have to leave their homes on Sunday evening in order to get here in time. There seems to be no reason why we should move it ahead to 6 o'clock in the evening when it could be just as easily done at 9 o'clock.

● (1415)

Honourable senators, I can have some alternative motions prepared, but at the moment we are talking about the motion on the order paper. We are inviting all honourable senators to give their views as to where the best solution lies. Perhaps the earliest timing is the best, perhaps the latest, or perhaps it is somewhere in between. We are here to listen to what honourable senators have to say as to how they feel we can best dispose of this matter.

Therefore, I propose that we discuss the matter now, hear the views expressed, and revert to Question Period either tonight or later this afternoon.

Honourable senators, I was asked this morning about the business of the Senate for next week. The only business that we could have next week would be a supply bill or Bill C-48. I do not think we will receive either until Friday. If we can debate this motion this week, we may not have to return next week. Even if we do have to return next week, we may not have to stay for as long as we would otherwise have to.

Therefore, honourable senators, that is the range. I would say that, with three sittings on Thursday, the earliest time at which we could vote would be at 2 o'clock on Friday afternoon. I would think that a reasonably long extension of the debate would be to some time on Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might raise a question here? I detect, from what the deputy leader has said, a sense of urgency in bringing this matter to a vote in this chamber. After 54 years of so-called inability to move on this issue, I find it inappropriate to inject a sense of urgency between now and next Monday.

This is the chamber of sober, second thought. We are dealing with one of the most fundamental changes to our constitutional system since Confederation. As the deputy leader has said, we have no business schedules for next week. He seems to be trying to compress our deliberations into three sittings on Thursday and a half-sitting ending at 2 o'clock on Friday—

Senator Frith: I did not move that.

Senator Lang: —or to sittings continuing Saturday and Sunday.

Senator Frith: I did not suggest any of those things.

Senator Lang: I have my notes on your suggestions right here.

Senator Frith: Well, they are wrong. I did not suggest that.

Senator Lang: We are talking about a major constitutional change that will fundamentally affect this institution for all time. We are talking about a change that will affect the whole future of our country, and we are trying to compress this debate into two-and-a-half days.

Senator Frith: Who said that? Nobody has suggested that.

Senator Lang: This is what your motion suggests.

Senator Frith: No, it does not. My motion results in a vote on Monday, and I am saying that Friday is a possible earlier time. I have been careful not to say that I am in favour of any one of the options. After I have heard what honourable senators have to say, I will state my view.

I suggest that the honourable senator either read Hansard or take my word for it. I said that Friday would be the earliest possible date. I did not say whether I was in favour or not in favour of it.

Senator Lang: I will conclude, then, by saying that I think we should follow our normal rules. We should not let anyone try to abridge our rules by any sort of consent here, because we are dealing with a matter that is fundamental not only to this institution, but to the whole of our country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to repeat what the deputy leader has said. The object of this exercise is to hear the views of honourable senators. We will continue with that exercise in caucus later this afternoon. We will resume consideration of this problem at 8 o'clock tonight. I do not think we need to vote on that motion before tomorrow afternoon, at which time we will know the final text of the resolution as adopted by the House of Commons. It will have come to us by then.

● (1420)

From what Senator Lang was saying, I take it he goes along with Senator McIlraith's suggestion that there should not be any limit to the debate. The problem with that is that in order for all honourable senators to make arrangements to be here it is necessary for them to know when the vote will take place. However, at the moment I am not taking a definite position on that. I simply wish to accommodate as many senators as possible on both sides of the house.

Generally speaking, I favour the idea of beginning the debate and, proceeding in accordance with our rules and practice, debating the matter all day Thursday until six o'clock, returning perhaps on Tuesday afternoon, with the vote then being held early Wednesday. I believe that is the latest suggestion and perhaps it will meet with general approval.

I think the idea behind that suggestion is to give honourable senators Friday, Saturday, Sunday and Monday to mull the situation over, because as Senator Lang has suggested—and I agree with him—this vote will probably be the most important that any senator will have had to participate in since Confederation. What the consequences of the vote will be, I do not know. That depends somewhat on the form in which the resolution is sent to us.

Both Senator Perrault and Senator Frith have been quite clear that they do not want to take any definite position at this time but are open to suggestions from both sides. I am hopeful that the debate can be continued in that spirit, knowing that we are trying to accommodate senators and the Senate. In that light I would welcome other suggestions either now or, if none are forthcoming at this time, before our respective caucuses.

I don't know if Senator Lang has called a caucus of his own group. Perhaps he would like to join us. If so, he is welcome. I think he would find that we would listen with great interest to his suggestions.

In any event, before we resume at eight o'clock this evening I will report to Senator Frith the consensus of our caucus, and perhaps he will tell me what the consensus was on the government side. I would stress, though, that the main point is that we should not appear to be rushing this resolution through.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I am not ignoring Senator Flynn's suggestion that we should defer most of this discussion until this evening in order to give the caucuses an opportunity to consider it before eight o'clock. I agree with that. However, surely it is no light matter to assert that to vote for or against this resolution may be the most important decision that those of us who are now here have ever been called upon to make in this chamber.

Believing I know something of the possible amendments that will have to be voted on in the other place, I think that the results of the votes on those amendments might have a great effect upon how the whole question of amendments and otherwise will be looked at here. I know the honourable leader is not putting the possibility aside, but it seems to me that it is not asking too much to allow senators the weekend to reflect upon this very serious question. I hope that all honourable senators will be thinking about this matter when they attend their respective caucuses.

[Senator Flynn.]

● (1425)

Hon. Allister Grosart: I would ask the deputy leader if there is a case for urgency in the Senate's reaching a final decision on this matter.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the only urgency which would have any practical or legal consequences relates to the situation in the United Kingdom where there are rules concerning a definite time period between first and second, and second and third readings. That time period is longer than what is required here, and I will attempt to bring specific details of it to this chamber. The schedule in Britain requires that the matter go to cabinet, then be introduced in Parliament by cabinet and then this stipulated period between the various readings must be met. This could result in the matter not being brought before the British Parliament before the late winter or spring.

As I said, honourable senators, I am not aware of the exact details of this time frame, but I will attempt to bring this information to the chamber. To my knowledge, this is the only matter which relates to a necessity regarding the next process.

Senator Grosart: Are we to understand then, considering whatever sitting arrangements may apply to the United Kingdom Parliament, that if the Senate were to take the action the government requests concerning this address, it could be passed by the British Parliament before Christmas? Is that the assumption at the moment?

Senator Frith: It is my information that it could be passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom before Christmas. I am not looking for an argument—

Senator Asselin: There is an argument.

Senator Frith: There may be but, at this stage, I am not looking for one. Perhaps the honourable senator and I will have an argument later.

For the moment, I am trying to give Senator Grosart the information I have available. My information is that there is some constraint regarding the next process which would make it possible for the British Parliament to pass the resolution before Christmas. If a certain time goes by, that will not be technically possible, but that is distinct from whether they can do so as a matter of policy. I will try to get more detail on this matter.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this point has been discussed and some informal recommendations have been received from overseas. I stress the word "informal" since they have not been formal, and are not in any written form. These recommendations indicate that Westminster would like to receive this measure as quickly as possible. The houses of the British Parliament are in the process of arranging their timetable for the coming period, and have suggested, although not in any official fashion, that they would like to receive the measure as soon as possible.

Senator Grosart: May we be informed as to the possible deadline that is inferred by the words "as soon as possible"? I am not looking for an argument; just information. My particular reason for raising this question is because I should like to vote on the constitutional question.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will undertake to try to have that information for the chamber by tonight.

Senator Grosart: From the procedure the deputy leader has outlined, should we take it that the motion for an Address in the Senate will be entirely separate and not a Joint Address, as has been usual at times, with a request from the House of Commons for concurrence?

Senator Frith: The honourable senator is correct. He is making reference to the fact that in most previous cases the Address was a Joint Address. In other words, it was passed either by the Senate or by the House of Commons, and sent to the other house for concurrence.

However, as was the case earlier in the year, the government has decided to proceed with concurrent resolutions. By adopting the suggestion put forward by Senator Flynn, we will be following the old procedure as closely as possible because we will not commence our debate until the other place has concluded its debate. This will mean we will not be waiting for something to come to us. We are simply waiting for them to complete their debate so that we can debate the same motion. We will be as close to the old procedure as we can be by following the "Flynn formula," if we may call it that.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: It is my understanding that the Quebec legislature may introduce a motion today requesting the Quebec Court of Appeal to deal with the veto question. Does the Deputy Leader of the Government anticipate that the British Parliament will deal with the resolution despite the fact that it is before a Canadian court?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have no specific information on that. It would be my opinion that, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, they would be more likely to deal with this measure than they would have been before the Supreme Court of Canada had pronounced on it. However, I can go no further than that.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, as Senator Flynn and Senator Lang have just said, it is perhaps one of the most important debates to take place in the Senate. Immediately I ask myself the following question, and in so doing I am not speaking on behalf of the caucus but merely making personal remarks.

Unless we have evidence that it is urgent to pass this resolution, why should we deal with it differently from the other place? Did they extend the sittings in the other place? Were arrangements made to prolong the debate? The only thing I learned about the other place is that they agreed to limit speeches to 20 minutes. There was no evidence of urgency over there, since it was agreed after about ten days a vote would be taken tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock.

We are asked here to change the pattern of our sittings. We are told that we have to sit on Friday—

Hon. Louis Robichaud: Why not?

Senator Asselin: Let me finish. Well, we just heard the view of those who seldom take part in the debates of this house.

Senator Robichaud: Only when I hear stupid things.

Senator Asselin: Then, you will just have to correct me. I have never, Senator Robichaud, refused to take part in or to attend the proceedings of the Senate. You can compare my attendance record with that of any other senator. I think that I am here quite often and I have always obeyed an order of the Senate requiring my presence.

However, why on Friday? Why on Monday? Ever since this session started back we have not had before us any legislation. What kind of work has been done in the Senate since the session resumed? We are now asked to hurry up and to settle everything in two or three days.

As I was saying, ever since this session started back, we have not had before us any legislation, which means that we have wasted our time most of the time. But we sat here just the same. And now that we have before us a document of utmost importance and significance for our country, we are told that we must deal with it within the next three days. We are told also that it is most urgent. The Deputy Leader of the Government stated a while ago that this was a requirement, if we wanted this resolution to reach London early enough to be introduced in Parliament. As Senator Flynn told us at noon today, someone in London was reported in the Gazette this morning as saying the resolution would not be considered before January or February. Well, I suggest that if they get it over there by Christmas, they will have ample time to deal with it in January or February. Why do we have to rush things so much? Why should we hurry more than the other place did to pass this resolution? This is an important document and we have amendments to move. Once the vote is over in the other place, we will need time to seek the advice of a number of groups, for we must reflect the views of the people we represent. However, we are told that this will not be the case, for the resolution must be dealt with promptly and passed within the next two or three days, because of its urgency.

Personally, I don't see any need to expedite the debate on this resolution because there is too much at stake. Unless someone convinces me that this is a matter of utmost urgency, I will object to any attempt at changing our normal sitting hours thus compelling us to rubber stamp this document, as we are forced to do much too often. When legislation comes before us, we are told to pass it very quickly. It would seem that we are here at the bidding of the other place as though our actions were insignificant.

As we heard last night on the CBC news broadcast the resolution will be passed by the House of Commons tomorrow afternoon and then adopted by the Senate on Thursday afternoon. This surely gives us a great reputation. Yet, we do nothing about it and then we pretend to be surprised with the poor opinion Canadians have of us.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, to be able to answer Honourable Senator Asselin's questions in the order they were asked I took them down. First of all, why sit on Friday? Well, because we have decided that it would be reasonable, under the circumstances, to sit on Friday, in view of the number of sitting days provided for under our Rules.

[English]

Senator Lang: Who are "we"?

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn and myself. With respect to Westminster, I have tried to emphasize the fact that this was not a suggestion on my part. I was merely trying to answer the questions raised by Senator Grosart who wanted to know whether there was a Westminster dimension to these options . . . I merely said that I was told there was, but I do not know too much about the details. It may well be that the best authority is the Montreal Gazette, but there may be others also. I said I was willing to try to get the facts with respect to the timetable in the other place, in order to see whether there is a Westminster dimension, that is a time limit, as Senator Grosart said.

With respect to the urgency of the issue, arguments for both sides can be based on the same facts. It is a generally accepted fact, I think, that we have been trying to get this resolution adopted for the last 50 years or so.

On the one hand, there is the argument that since we have been at it for the last 50 years, we should be done with it. We have had enough of this issue for 50 years, let us end it. But using the same data or facts one could also argue that since we have been at it for 50 years, we can wait two or three more weeks. These are divergent opinions. We recognize and are grateful for your clearly expressed opinion to the effect that we do not want to end off—

Senator Asselin: To rush.

Senator Frith: If I correctly understood Senator Asselin, he would prefer no time limit. I took note of it.

Senator Asselin: I did not say that. I did not say that I was against having a time limit, but as you yourself mentioned, we have nothing on the agenda for next week. So why not take the whole week to discuss the resolution since the other place took 12 days for its debate? Why must we be rushed once again? If we are to do good work, we have to have enough time, to see, as the discussion progresses, how the issues are presented and how we can reach a conclusion.

Senator Frith: I appreciate this, but I treat the last intervention as a personal opinion. And as I said, the reason why we did not use all the opportunities we had up until now, that is last week and the week before, is that we decided, I think, not to proceed until the other place had completed its work. This is an opinion. It may not be shared by all, but that is the reason.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, over the last week I have noticed that the Senate has a tendency to spend much more time discussing procedure than substance.

Senator Flynn: There is no substance.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Robichaud: This is getting fastidious. Clearly, we are going to have substance soon, and I agree with the submission that this probably is the most important vote to be taken after discussion in this house. I would be the last to try to prevent anyone from expressing his views here in as many words as he chooses, providing we do sit. But if we sit only from Tuesday to Thursday, the proceedings could be delayed.

I do not share the view that we should have the Constitution by July 1st, or by Christmas. Not at all. I am of the opposite view that Westminster is just as flexible as our own institution here, and we are going to have the Constitution patriated when there is a joint resolution passed by the Senate, after discussion in this place, without any obstacle, providing we do sit. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection whatsoever to a Friday sitting. It has been suggested earlier that things were moving in the Commons. Of course, things were moving, because they were sitting there Monday evening and Friday. Here, we refuse to sit. As far as I am concerned, I have no wish to rush things, I am not of the opinion we should pass a resolution as soon as we receive it. I feel that everyone here has a right to express his views on the resolution in as many words as he wishes, providing we do sit, and this means no adjournment for sometimes over-extended weekends.

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, the first point I should like to make is that I really believe the outcome of this debate depends upon how many senators wish to speak on it, which we do not yet know. That is the first thing we should try to find out at the caucus meetings at 4.30 p.m.

My second point is that under the circumstances there is no way we can leave on Thursday afternoon and coolly come back on Tuesday evening to continue the debate. It is not rushing it, for us to sit on Friday and Monday. If we are going to sit on Monday and if the vote should be in on Monday, then we should postpone the vote to a time on Monday when all honourable senators can be present. I do not think we necessarily have to have the vote as early as 2 o'clock on Friday afternoon. The House of Commons sits every Friday until 5 o'clock, so there is no reason why we could not have the vote at 3.30 p.m. I think we are really talking in the dark until we know how many honourable senators wish to participate in the debate.

Another point I should like to make is that the Senate should not be sitting on Thursday morning to debate this motion because there are some important committee meetings scheduled for that morning. Bill C-48 is a matter of urgency. We are having the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Thursday morning and that is a very important meeting and a lot more urgent than, although not as important as, this particular motion. As far as I am concerned, important committee meetings should take precedence over the sitting of the Senate and over this resolution when there is some urgency.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I am as much concerned about the time of the beginning of this debate as I am about the time of its ending. Can anyone assure us that, if we commence our debate on this motion on Thursday morning, the resolution in its final form will actually be before us in print? Is it clear that it will be? Are we likely to have an opportunity to see it before we walk into the chamber and take our places? That is another reason why I have come to the same conclusion as Senator Godfrey, that if we do not have to commence the debate on Thursday morning we shall at least have Thursday morning in which to study the nature of the resolution. I do not care whether we vote on it in two or three days. My preference is to commence the debate and not restrict ourselves until we have seen how the debate is proceeding. If that is not acceptable to honourable senators, I will not make a fuss about it. However, I am of the opinion that on a matter of this importance another day or two in this chamber is something that we should be quite prepared to accord, if, in fact, there are sufficient honourable senators wishing to speak on the matter. I want to speak on it. I did not speak on the first resolution for the very reason that I wanted to wait until after the adjournment and the decision of the Supreme Court. I do want to speak on the present resolution. So let us try, in our caucuses this afternoon, to determine an approximate list of speakers and to give them an opportunity to speak for reasonable lengths of time. I do not believe there is any indication that anyone—and certainly not my honourable friends in the official opposition—is contemplating a filibuster. I believe we are all concerned that reasonable people should have a reasonable time to make their reasonable contributions.

● (1440)

Senator Frith: In dealing with that point, may I say that I suppose nothing is absolutely sure. Damon Runyon used to say that nothing in life was better than six to five against. Within that framework, I am quite sure that by tomorrow afternoon we shall have the text of the resolution available for distribution to honourable senators. It will be tabled in this chamber, with copies being distributed, either tomorrow afternoon or on Thursday; but I am quite sure that we shall have that form for honourable senators by late tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, may I have leave to make reference to Senator Godfrey's comment about committee meetings on Thursday morning?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Smith: I am sure the honourable senator did not do it intentionally, but he left out a very important committee meeting, namely, that of Transport and Communications. That committee has arranged to hear Mr. J. F. Roberts, the chairman and president of VIA Rail, and his advisers on Thursday morning. While I do not say that VIA Rail and the Constitution are of equal importance, nevertheless it should be kept in mind that committee members cannot be in both places at once, although they are very able members.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, on that same point, the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages meets regularly twice a week, on Tuesdays and Thursdays from 9.30 a.m. until 12.30 p.m. I believe that committee is also an important one.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, my impression is that we are not concerned with the time factor. We are already way behind time. No one is likely to demand that a deadline be set for our debate. I believe the decision should lie with the Leader of the Opposition. No honourable senator should be placed in the position of saying that he did not have a chance to speak. Whether it takes until Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday, I do not care how long the debate lasts. The opposition can filibuster or do whatever it likes. This is an historic occasion, and all honourable senators must have the right to speak. We do not want Canadians to say, "You see what they did? They rushed it through without giving the matter any thought at all." Let us take the time we need to discuss this matter fully.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am always a little uncomfortable discussing the limitation of a debate before the debate begins, because it is neither wise nor prudent to do so, nor is it borne out by experience or the history of this place. Senator Hicks is right in that whatever the Senate is noted for it is not noted for mounting frequent filibusters, and I do not believe there is any disposition on the part of honourable senators to mount one now. I also have the feeling, despite what we have been told, that the target date—having the whole thing processed by the United Kingdom Parliament before Christmas—is as unrealistic as it is unnecessary, which does something to the idea of haste.

I would be more comfortable, as I believe would the Senate as a whole, if we had, in fact, no motion at all, if we allowed our usual consultations, good judgment and what is called the sense of the Senate to prevail. I think we could then cope with the matter very well.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this afternoon we have had a useful discussion and a number of valuable suggestions have been made. I wish to make it clear that government supporters in the Senate are in favour of all honourable senators wishing to speak on the motion being given an opportunity to do so.

As Senator Lang and others have pointed out, this is an historic time for the Parliament of Canada. I believe that the suggestion put forward by Senator Godfrey, and supported by other honourable senators, contains a good deal of merit. Those who wish to should have the right to speak; we should commence the debate as soon as possible; and we should debate on consecutive sitting days, with additional debating time being allocated, if necessary. In my view, we should get on with our task as soon as members of the other place have voted. Canadians should not have cause to say that the Senate took its task lightly.

As I have said, there is merit in giving every honourable senator who wishes to speak an opportunity to do so, and in scheduling the Senate debate as soon as is feasible. In caucus this afternoon we will determine the number of senators who wish to participate in the debate. It may be that the Friday target, which was suggested as one option by the Deputy Leader of the Government, is entirely attainable without restricting anyone's right to speak; but we cannot know those facts until we meet later this afternoon. Perhaps there can be some useful discussion after those meetings, just as we have had useful discussions with the Leader of the Opposition so far this week.

I wish also to make it clear, as the Deputy Leader of the Government mentioned at the outset, that the options he described are just that—options; that there may be other proposals that will come out of the meetings this afternoon which should be discussed in the Senate.

With regard to the Parliament at Westminster, I repeat that we have received no official communication that they must have the measure by a certain date. In reply to Senator Grosart and others who raised this point, may I say that there have been informal suggestions that the sooner they receive the measure for consideration, the sooner they can establish their parliamentary timetable in the weeks to come. But there will be no inordinate pressure applied to honourable senators in connection with this matter. This is an historic occasion and action should be taken with a sense of history in mind.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, at this time I might move the adjournment of the debate. In the caucus meetings we can determine the reasonable time to give honourable senators the opportunity to speak and for the vote to take place. It seems to me that whether we vote on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday, normally the Senate should be able to take a decision next week. We might try to determine a date next week, whether it be Tuesday or Wednesday, and agree to have the vote on that day. I will take the suggestion to caucus this afternoon, and we can deal with the result of those meetings later this evening.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree that all the suggestions made should be considered in caucus, including the suggestion that there should be no limit to the debate. If there is to be no limit, then I suggest that we should consider that while we do not want to leave the impression that we are limiting the debate, we may also not want to leave the impression that we will go home for three days without continuing the debate. Those are two aspects that have to be considered.

In any event, I would ask honourable senators for leave to stand this matter until later this day, at which time we shall continue our debate on it with the benefit of the views expressed in caucus and the views of certain senators who may not be here either for caucus or for this afternoon's sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT—INTERPRETATION BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In view of the fact that the gross national product declined in the third quarter of this year by 4 per cent, may I return to a matter I raised with the minister during Question Period on November 17; that is, the government's diagnosis of the actual state of the economy? In the judgment of the government, is Canada now in a recession?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, what has to be taken into account in connection with this matter is that the gross national product rose in the first two quarters, in respect of most prognostications, at an unusual and, indeed, much higher rate than was expected. I believe it is true that the GNP rose by a real annual rate of 6.1 per cent from September 1980 until the end of June 1981, which, of course, was higher than the Department of Finance, or, indeed, any of the other prognosticators, were indicating. While a 4 per cent decline is unacceptably high, the Minister of Finance and others have been forecasting that there would be some fall-back from that very strong growth that we experienced in the three previous quarters.

Senator Murray: I take it, then, that the reply of the minister and the government is in the negative, and that Canada is not now in a recession. May I therefore ask the minister to obtain for us a statement from the Minister of Finance as to what, in the judgement of the minister, constitutes an economic recession?

Senator Olson: Yes, I can give that.

My honourable friend can go back to the traditional interpretation of what constitutes a recession; that is, a decline in two or more consecutive quarters. I suppose we also have to look at the amount, not only from one quarter to the next but also from one year to the next, because in the last quarter of 1980, the economy grew in real terms at a rate of something over 8 per cent, and it does not seem to me that a decline of something less than that total of 8 per cent is quite as serious as it would have been if there had not been that very strong growth in the last quarter of last year.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the various statistical possibilities that the minister raises. However, so that we may be aware of the basis of government economic policy, what I want to know is exactly on what grounds the government decides that a recession is or is not with us. I would like to have that statistical information so that we can better judge the appropriateness of the policies that are brought to bear.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I give an undertaking that I will refer that question to the Minister of Finance, but I think that if the honourable senator re-reads—and I am sure he does that quite often—the budget speeches of 1980 and 1981, he will find that the minister did not forecast as high a rate of growth in the last quarter of 1980, nor in the two subsequent quarters. Along with that growth there was also a higher rate of inflation than was anticipated. I think you can draw from that the inference that perhaps some of the budget proposals, where there was some stimulation, were perhaps inappropriate, supposing that we had known that that inflation and that rate of growth were going to take place.

Of course, in 1981, in his budget speech, the minister made it rather clear that one of the most difficult tasks facing the government, in trying to plan economic policy, was not only the continuing rate of unacceptably high inflation but also the interest rate held up at those levels, partially, at least, by the massive amounts of money required to finance the government deficit. If he looks at those speeches, I think my honourable friend will get an indication of what the attitude of the Minister of Finance is.

If my honourable friend is simply looking for a specific definition of when we are in a recession and when we are not, I will ask the Minister of Finance if he can provide one.

Senator Murray: I simply want to be reassured, as I think the Senate and the country would want to be, that this government would recognize a recession when it happened.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE SINAI—CANADA'S NON-PARTICIPATION IN UNITED NATIONS PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It concerns the information that came out a few days ago that Canada would not be participating in the peacekeeping force to be set up in the Sinai.

I was shocked to note that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when informing the press of this, upon being asked, "Who told you that you wouldn't be needed?" gave the answer, "The American government."

I wonder if there were any exchanges at all between the Government of Canada and the Government of Israel, or any of the Arab states, on this matter, and if pressures were placed upon Canada such as those put upon four European countries and subsequently withdrawn, after, again, consultation with Washington. Could the minister bring us up to date on that very important matter?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received a memorandum from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which reads as follows:

We have discussed the multilateral force in the Sinai with many countries over the past several weeks, but we have not been formally invited to participate. Some time ago, we were told by the Americans that our participation was not needed; accordingly, we have no decision to make. We support the Camp David Accords, including the return of all of Sinai to Egypt next April. We hope that the European offer will be accepted along with the offer from Australia, New Zealand and other countries.

Then the minister provides other information, with the object of supplying background to this. This is with regard to a specific question on the Middle East:

—the most effective way of defending peace in that region would be to try to eliminate the sources of conflict that can be exploited by any outside power for its own purposes.

He goes on to say:

At the United Nations General Assembly in September, I pointed out the importance of dealing with the Palestinian problem if there was ever to be a just and lasting peace. The Camp David peace process, which we support, has been trying to come to grips with this problem. The idea of sending a Canadian contingent under United Nations auspices to safeguard the status quo after the last third of the Sinai is returned to Egypt is not an option at this time, since the United Nations has not agreed to become involved in supervising the implementation of the peace treaty between Israel and Egypt under which the Sinai is being returned.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, the second part of that reply does not really apply to my question, but I am very glad to have it. I might also say, en passant, that I thought the minister's speech at the United Nations—and I refer to the portion dealing with the Middle East—was the best and most realistic that any of our foreign ministers have given on the subject yet; but that still does not get to the question as to what sort of negotiations are going on if the definitive answer comes from the United States on this. Is this the usual way of doing things? Sir Robert Borden must be rolling around in his mausoleum.

• (1500)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. The Secretary of State for External Affairs will be asked to provide additional information, which might well satisfy the Honourable Senator Macquarrie.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

ACCESS TO INFORMATION BILL—PROPOSED COMMITTEE PRE-STUDY

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question to ask of Senator Goldenberg in his capacity as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

As you may recall, last Thursday afternoon I asked him a question with regard to the committee conducting a pre-study of the access to information bill. Senator Goldenberg replied that he:

was advised as recently as the day before yesterday that it would not be convenient for the officials whom we require as witnesses to appear at this stage while the bill is still before the house committee.

From a later question, I gather it was the minister who told him that.

I decided to see just how busy these officials were and whether they had any legitimate reason for trying to put the Senate off. I was informed that this bill was last considered by the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee of the House of Commons on November 19. Since then that committee met again on November 24, November 26, and December 1 to study the supplementary estimates. I am also informed by Mr. Fournier, the clerk of the committee, that the Honourable Mr. Fox will not be available for the next two weeks. The committee, therefore, will not be sitting to consider this access to information bill.

I should like to ask Senator Goldenberg whether, in view of this information, he is now prepared to put the wheels in motion to begin a pre-study of the access to information bill so that the committee can at least be briefed by the officials. Is the honourable senator prepared to do that now?

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, as a senator who speaks rather infrequently in this chamber, I appreciate the opportunities given me by Senator Godfrey to do so.

I answered Senator Godfrey's question last week to the best of my ability. I received the information, which I transmitted, from authoritative sources. I have no reason to believe that the information was incorrect. I advised Senator Godfrey this morning that I have succeeded in obtaining information which I had told him, I believe two weeks ago, that I was trying to get. I now have the information on possible pre-studies that might be made by the committee.

Though I know there are conflicts, I have called a meeting of the committee for Thursday morning at 9.30. It was the only available time I could find. I knew that the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, of which Senator Godfrey is joint chairman, was meeting at 11 and I did not want him to say that I had fixed a time at which he could not attend. I advised him of that today, and that committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. on Thursday.

Senator Godfrey did ask me why I was calling the whole committee together. I said that I wanted to report to the committee and that I wanted the committee to decide what work it should do, to which he had a very quick reply. He said that Senator Hayden never bothers to ask his committee what pre-studies the committee will make: he decides that matter.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Did he say that?

Senator Goldenberg: That is what he told me.

Honourable senators, I have only been in the Senate for a little over 10 years. Therefore, I do not have the prestige of Senator Hayden. I propose to ask the consent of the committee for whatever work it wishes to do.

Incidentally, Senator Godfrey is the only member of the 30-member committee of which I am the chairman who has asked that we conduct a pre-study of the access to information bill. Let me remind Senator Godfrey that in June 1977 the government introduced a bill on freedom of information, and tabled in the House of Commons a green paper which, you will recall, was entitled "Legislation on Public Access to Government Documents." That green paper was not referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It was referred to the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which made a report, in due course, the following December.

At this time I remind honourable senators who are members of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs that they will receive notice of the meeting to be held on Thursday morning. I know that there is a conflict in the scheduling, but I do not think our meeting will last a long time. I will have a report and suggestions to present to the committee on Thursday morning.

Senator Asselin: We will be there.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. When I spoke to Senator Goldenberg before the Senate met, he said, "I have to get the authorization of the full committee, as it has never conducted a pre-study of a bill." Honourable senators, I was amazed at that statement because my recollection, which I have now confirmed, is that on January 24, 1979, Senator Goldenberg did move that the subject matter of the public referendums bill be referred to his committee.

I cannot attend the meeting of the committee on Thursday morning because Mr. Lalonde is appearing before the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to discuss Bill C-48. I believe that has precedence. I do hope, however, that the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs does not have something like "Christmas closure" on this bill. My major concern is that it will go through the House of Commons and will be rushed through this chamber. As Senator Grosart pointed out in his speech a couple of weeks ago, the Senate should take the initiative in these matters. We should not be considered only as a chamber of sober, second thought. As Senator Grosart pointed out, once a bill has come here from the House of Commons, the chance of the Senate generating any real influence is vastly diminished. On the other hand, if we could report on the subject matter of the bill before it has passed through the House of Commons, we could have real input through the recommendations of the committee.

Senator Goldenberg: The Honourable Senator Godfrey is quite correct. I do remember the pre-study of the bill on public referendums; I had forgotten that this morning.

As I said, Senator Godfrey may not be able to attend the meeting, but other senators will consider and decide what we will do. It may not necessarily be what Senator Godfrey wants the committee to do. I will be guided by the committee and not by one member of the committee.

Senator Godfrey: I hope that the honourable senator will not be guided merely by what the minister wants, either.

Senator Goldenberg: I did not speak to a member of the cabinet with regard to the information I gave to the Senate on Thursday.

Senator Godfrey: Then who was the non-bureaucrat you were speaking to?

THE CONSTITUTION

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Asselin on November 26 concerning a letter delivered to the Prime Minister.

On Wednesday, November 25, 1981, Mr. Normand, Deputy Minister of Interprovincial Affairs for Quebec, did indeed hand-deliver the letter from Mr. Lévesque to Mr. Trudeau regarding a possible veto for Quebec. Apparently that information was not conveyed to the office of the Minister of Justice. I said that I would clarify the situation.

The Prime Minister has prepared an answer which is to be sent today, December 1, 1981. As soon as the letter is made public, the text of it will be made available to honourable senators.

[Later:]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I believe there has been general distribution of the text of the letter from the Prime Minister of Canada to the Premier of Quebec in response to Mr. Lévesque's letter of November 25, 1981.

If any honourable senator has not received a copy, please inform my office and a copy will be provided.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Is there a French version of the letter?

Senator Perrault: Yes, honourable senators.

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question addressed to me by Senator Flynn in my capacity as Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

On November 10, 1981, Senator Flynn questioned the Leader of the Government about the authority of the government to spend money on a publicity campaign in Quebec aimed at selling the Charter of Rights or the constitutional package to that province. Senator Flynn's question of me was:

Would the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments look into the question of whether the government has proper authority to spend that money under these circumstances?

I replied:

I am not sure whether that committee has the right to look into that type of matter, but I will certainly make inquiries.

I referred the matter to Mr. Graham Eglinton, legal counsel to the committee. His opinion was that the matter "doesn't seem to have anything to do with the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments," with which I agree.

In my opinion, therefore, the committee does not have the authority to look into this matter, as it is beyond its terms of reference.

THE ESTIMATES

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Everett).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Everett has been delayed by bad weather or other problems related to travel. For that reason I ask that this order stand until later this day.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—MOTION RESPECTING DISPOSITION AGREED TO

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of November 26, 1981, moved:

That the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, notice of which was given by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., on November 19, 1981, be disposed of as follows:

1. On the first sitting day following the final disposition by the House of Commons of the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen moved by the Minister of Justice on November 20, 1981, the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., shall move the motion of which he gave notice on November 19, 1981, with such modifications as may be necessary to make it conform to the resolution adopted by the House of Commons; and

2. At six o'clock p.m. on the second sitting day after the day the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., has moved the motion referred to in paragraph 1, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and put all questions necessary to dispose of the said motion.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to speak to this procedural resolution. We were discussing it when we adjourned to resume at the call of the bell. I point out that I do not want to close the debate on the matter. Others may well have something to add, and I do not want it thought that I am speaking on the subject in order to close the debate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We can agree that that rule will not apply.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let me give a short résumé of where we stand. If honourable senators wish to refer to the motion itself, they will find it on page xxxiv of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for Thursday, November 26, 1981.

Honourable senators will notice that the main body of the motion refers to the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault of which he gave notice on November 19, 1981, saying that it should be "disposed of as follows", after which there are two paragraphs. The first paragraph reads:

1. On the first sitting day following the final disposition by the House of Commons of the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen . . . the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., shall move the motion of which he gave notice on November 19, 1981—

I ask honourable senators to place some emphasis on the next three lines because they form an important part of what we think we should do.

—with such modifications as may be necessary to make it conform to the resolution adopted by the House of Commons;

In the second paragraph the motion deals with a limitation of the time for debate by naming a time at which the Speaker shall "interrupt the proceedings and put all questions necessary to dispose of the said motion."

In summary, paragraph 1 deals with the beginning, and paragraph 2 deals with the ending, and whether there is complete consensus or not I think it is fair to say that the feeling—as I understand it at any rate—of both caucuses that took place this afternoon at 4.30 is that it is not advisable at this time to set any ending to the debate. We may decide at any time to agree on a vote to be held on a certain day, but at the moment it is felt we should leave out the second part of the motion and proceed with the first part only. That will mean that we will start the debate on the first day after the vote in the other place, and I think we have already agreed that we will begin on Thursday at two o'clock in the afternoon. We will do that because there are some important committee meetings scheduled for Thursday morning, at which some distinguished witnesses will be appearing.

Honourable senators, I would suggest, therefore, that we adopt only that part of the motion dealing with the commencement of the debate on Thursday, and ignore the second part for the time being.

[Senator Frith.]

Although we are almost sure we know the form in which the resolution will be passed in the other place, we are not positive, and because of that I suggest we wait until tomorrow to introduce the motion. At that time Senator Perrault will move the motion with only a comment or two, the purpose of being not to launch the debate but to ensure that the motion for the Address appears in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and in Hansard.

Senator Flynn: You will do that tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Yes, that will not be done today, but tomorrow. As soon as we know that it has been passed in the other place—and we believe we know the form it will take—Senator Perrault will simply move the motion, and the debate will be adjourned until 2 p.m. on Thursday. If we follow that procedure, we can distribute copies of the final draft to all honourable senators by Thursday afternoon at 2 o'clock, when the debate begins.

I come now to the third and final matter on which I would ask for the support or the views of honourable senators. While it does not appear as part of this order, I ask that we defer voting on the amendments until the end of the debate, whenever that is.

So, honourable senators, in summary, because I do not wish to shut off further debate, I invite further debate, and then, at the conclusion of such further debate, we will vote on the motion which is shown as No. 2 on page xxxiv, leave having been given for the withdrawal of paragraph 2 thereof. Therefore, we will vote on the motion as it appears, with the introduction and paragraph 1. Then, perhaps we could pass a motion granting leave for the document to be placed on the Order Paper, if we are notified soon enough tomorrow of its contents, and then the debate will commence on Thursday.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, what the Deputy Leader of the Government has said constitutes a most reasonable consensus. We will begin the debate on Thursday with the text of the resolution as passed by the other place, and we should know by 10 o'clock this evening what the content of that resolution will be. The debate in the House of Commons is to end this evening at 10 o'clock, and the vote is to take place tomorrow. On Thursday, at 2 o'clock, the debate will proceed here in the usual fashion.

I agree with the proposal that we deal only with the first paragraph, therefore debating during the afternoon and evening of Thursday and on into Friday. Perhaps on Thursday evening we can decide how long we shall debate the resolution on Friday. On Monday we shall return and continue. But if we believe that a vote can be taken, for example, on Wednesday, then probably we would give notice on Monday that the vote would be on either Tuesday or Wednesday.

The idea behind this procedure is to not impose closure, so that all honourable senators who wish to may say their piece.

The general approach is that we will proceed and adjust according to the circumstances, which, to me, is eminently reasonable. Despite the fact that the motion as amended will not include it, honourable senators should be given at least 24 hours' notice of the time at which the vote will be taken.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, it is my opinion that all senators should be informed that the vote will not take place before, for example, 9 o'clock on Monday evening.

Senator Flynn: That is what I said.

Senator Godfrey: I do not understand the reasoning as to why we must give 24 hours' notice.

Senator Flynn: The reason I say that is because if we feel on Friday that we can take the vote on Monday—

Senator Godfrey: We may not know that on Monday. I think that all honourable senators should be here at 9 o'clock on Monday evening.

Senator Flynn: Are we to tell our colleagues on Monday afternoon that the vote will take place at 9 o'clock that evening?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave also granted, honourable senators, to delete paragraph 2?

Senator Frith: Including the word "and" of paragraph 1.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.:

That the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, notice of which was given by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., on November 19, 1981, be disposed of as follows:

On the first sitting day following the final disposition by the House of Commons of the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen moved by the Minister of Justice on November 20, 1981, the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., shall move the motion of which he gave notice on November 19, 1981, with such modifications as may be necessary to make it conform to the resolution adopted by the House of Commons.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the other matter under consideration relates to whether we might agree to defer votes on amendments.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Yes.

Senator Frith: Perhaps this matter should form a separate motion.

Senator Flynn: You could say that we agree to the motion in principle. The details do not have to be spelled out tonight; that could be done either tomorrow or even on Thursday.

We generally agree that, when an amendment is moved, the debate on the amendment should be relevant, but that no tactics should be used to delay the debate on a certain amendment to prevent another amendment being moved; and that when the relevant debate is completed, the Speaker should put the question and, if a division is to take place, the actual vote is to be taken only at the end of the debate at the same time as the final vote. Of course, this situation will not arise in the event of a unanimous vote.

Senator Frith: That certainly makes sense, but I think we should agree on a written motion so that we all understand the agreement.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Frith: The only problem which may arise is the question of notice and leave being granted. Perhaps we could settle that question tonight and agree that leave will be granted to present such a motion tomorrow. We do not have to agree to it at this time, but we should have leave to present such a motion tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: You will have leave to present it tomorrow or on Thursday, or whenever you want.

Senator Frith: There may be some senators, for whom neither I nor the Leader of the Government can speak, who may wish to say no—not that I am inviting them to do so.

Senator Flynn: We are all very reasonable persons.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Too much so, in my opinion.

Senator Flynn: I can speak for this side, but perhaps you should keep an eye on your side.

Senator Asselin: We are only servants of the government.

Senator Frith: Another matter for consideration at this time is the question of when we shall sit on Friday. I have prepared a motion that we should sit at 10 o'clock on Friday morning, but the Leader of the Opposition has suggested that it may be preferable to settle that question tomorrow. If that suggestion is agreeable to others, it is satisfactory to me.

However, I do have a notice prepared that we should sit on Friday morning at 10 o'clock. Strictly speaking, I have to give notice now but, as I understand the comments of the Leader of the Opposition, we can settle this question tomorrow or on Thursday.

Senator Flynn: It certainly meets with my approval, but if the intention is that we should sit on Friday afternoon and Friday evening, it may not be necessary to commence at 10 o'clock.

Senator Frith: We should settle this matter on the basis of our progress on Thursday.

As to amendments and the procedure on votes on amendments, I understand that I will be granted leave to present a motion in that regard tomorrow, after we have tried to settle the formula.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (2040)

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, as I mentioned once before, I, and two or three other honourable senators, cannot be committed without being asked whether or not we agree. I am not trying to be difficult. I am merely pointing out a fact. All honourable senators around me agree, I am sure, that when it comes to the question of sitting times, unless there is a very good reason such as the debate being in full swing, we should not sit later than 6 o'clock on Friday evening if we are going to sit on Monday. At that stage, the debate would be getting somewhat dog-eared and tiresome, and the extra couple of hours on the Friday evening would achieve nothing at all. I would prefer to have the motion provide that we sit on Monday and have the vote at that time.

THE ESTIMATES

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982, which was presented on November 23, 1981.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, during my absence last week, Senator Leblanc, the Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, tabled the report of the committee on supplementary estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982. That report was printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of November 25.

Supplementary estimates (C) total $3.877 billion, and bring the total spending for the year to $69.055 billion. In its hearing on supplementary estimates (C), the committee asked the President of the Treasury Board about the revised format of estimates that is to be instituted. This revised format will relate all expenditures to the overall objectives of the government. The Honourable Donald Johnston told us the new format will not be ready for another year; in fact, it will not be implemented until 1985-86 estimates.

We also discussed with Treasury Board the $1 votes, and assured ourselves that they were not being used for legislative purposes. We received information on the point raised by the Auditor General that the liabilities of the government are understated by some $9 billion due largely to the unfunded pension obligations. We asked for further information on that and we are still awaiting it.

We were assured by the President of the Treasury Board that under the envelope system the role of the Treasury Board has not diminished, and we made inquiries into the payment to VIA Rail for its operations, which, interestingly enough, despite the fact that certain lines have been closed down, this year aggregates $506 million.

One of the largest increases in the estimates is in the public debt charges of $2.357 billion, bringing the public debt charges for the year to $14.760 billion, which is 19 per cent over the original estimate. This is due largely to increased interest rates, and it is notable that long-term government bonds were underestimated by 300 basis points, treasury bills by 700 basis points and Canada Savings Bonds by 900 basis points.

Senator Roblin: How many?

Senator Everett: Canada Savings Bonds were underestimated by 900 basis points. That is what we were informed by the President and staff of the Treasury Board.

Finally, honourable senators, I should like to deal briefly with an initiative taken by Senator Marshall. The supplementary estimates dealt with an item under the heading "Veterans Affairs", and Senator Marshall asked Senator Frith whether it would be possible for the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to inquire into that particular item. Senator Frith replied that the estimates were being considered by the National Finance Committee and, therefore, it was not possible for another committee to consider them. However, he said it was possible to refer the specific items relating to Veterans Affairs to the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, and, indeed, that was done.

Some time ago Senator Olson, when he was Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, asked me whether he could do much the same thing in relation to some pipeline legislation. At the time I successfully resisted the idea, and I believe that probably I would have resisted Senator Marshall's initiative had I been in the chamber when he moved the appropriate motion. However, I was not present at that time, and the motion was adopted. That caused me to think about it, and it is my view now that perhaps I was wrong in resisting Senator Olson's initiative, and that it might be a good thing that Senator Marshall's motion was adopted.

Perhaps we should think about this. In dealing with the estimates, it might be a good idea to refer particular areas to standing committees that have much more expertise in those areas than the National Finance Committee. In other words, following the precedent set by Senator Marshall's initiative, we might refer items relating to health, welfare and science to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, items relating to taxation or commerce to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and items relating to transport to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. It would not mean that all areas covered by the estimates would be referred to various committees, but only that certain parts would be so referred, so that they would be subjected to a much more intensive examination than would be possible in the National Finance Committee.

That would mean that the National Finance Committee could involve itself in a general overview of the estimates and their effect on the economy. Of course, it would always be our intention, as has been demonstrated by five major reports, to undertake intensive examinations of government departments and government policy. However, I think it might immeasurably improve the job that the Senate does on both the main estimates and the supplementary estimates. I have therefore become reformed in this regard. We may have the seed of a good idea here, and rather than resisting the initiatives taken by Senator Olson and Senator Marshall, and agreed upon by Senator Frith, we ought to pursue that idea.

● (2050)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I had no intention of speaking on this matter, but when Senator Everett made his proposal I recalled that referring the estimates to the various committees is what they have been doing in the House of Commons, and my impression was that this had not been a great success. I do agree that if a committee of the Senate, on its own initiative, wants to look into a specific part of the estimates, as Senator Marshall has suggested, then it should be permitted to do so; but, on the basis of the experience of the House of Commons, there would be no advantage in the National Finance Committee's abdicating its responsibilities by referring the various parts of the estimates to the respective Senate committees.

As a general rule, I gather, what happens in the House of Commons is that the committees seek to get more money rather than closely examine the estimates they are particularly concerned with. I therefore just offer this word of caution, that while I agree that if a committee wants to look at a certain part of the estimates it should be permitted to do so, I do not think we should lightheartedly follow the House of Commons routine, in view of the kind of experience they have had.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, Senator Godfrey makes a good point. I recall, however, that when we first started doing this we were talking about $6 billion or $10 billion of annual expenditures, and we found that trying to look at the blue book of estimates was really a pretty unfruitful pursuit. That is why we developed the idea of an intensive examination of a government department. If I recall correctly, we dealt with: growth, employment and price stability; Information Canada—which was really a study of the information services of government; Canada Manpower; and Public Works. Shortly, we hope to complete our report on regional development and regional disparities, which began as an examination of DREE. We found we had to do this in order to be able to zero in on the way a department was run, what the meaning of its expenditures really was, and how it could improve its efficiency and effectiveness.

Looking at the blue book of estimates—even when we were talking about a mere $10 billion, whereas now we are talking about $70 billion was not a very effective exercise. It may be that the House of Commons is not effective in this regard either. I have never found the other place to be a good model for the Senate, because they are too partisan, dealing as they do with the day-to-day political effect of their statements and their decisions, so it is true that the Agriculture Committee of the other place, for example, will try to increase the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. Perhaps they do not look at them that intensively. However, as I say, that would not happen here.

This represents an interesting possible initiative, with the object of improving the work of the National Finance Committee with the aid of the other committees. Obviously, it would depend on their willingness to go along with the idea. I am not saying it ought to be mandatory. It would be something we should try to negotiate with the other committees. Perhaps we would then get a better look at the estimates than we have been able to achieve hitherto, with the exception that I think we, in the National Finance Committee, do a good job of taking an overview of the estimates with regard to how they relate to the economy of the country. Also, in my view, we have done a good job of carrying out intensive examinations of individual departments.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I do not suppose that Senator Everett has really closed the debate. Some years ago we discussed this subject at a meeting of the National Finance Committee. As far as I am concerned, looking at the estimates is a farce; it has never produced anything. I do not even bother turning up at such meetings.

At one time we did propose that we should invite all honourable senators to make suggestions about the estimates. We proposed that we should ask written questions of the department rather than spend our time going through the estimates. We agreed at one point on a system. Senator Everett, however, did not quite agree with that system. As far as I am concerned, therefore, at present we are just going through the motions.

I would be prepared to go back to the agreement that I thought we had reached about three or four years ago; namely, to invite all honourable senators to consider the estimates or to assign different senators certain aspects of the estimates so that they would be sure to expend the energy to look into them. However, I do not think that what Senator Everett suggests regarding the committees will work any better than the present system.

Senator Everett: I rise on a point of order, honourable senators. We did indeed put into operation the very scheme Senator Godfrey is talking about. We did ask all members of the Senate to suggest areas of investigation. It is a matter of record; the honourable senator can read it. We did break down the estimates into areas which were assigned to individual senators. It simply did not work.

Senator Godfrey: Come on, now.

Senator Everett: The record is there for you to check. That system did not work.

Senator Godfrey: My recollection is different.

Senator Everett: I would not pretend to argue with your recollection. I am just saying that perhaps you should consult the record in respect of that.

Senator Godfrey: I certainly will.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I do not rise to participate in the discussion which has just been taking place in the terms in which it has been held. I rise because I believe I have an obligation to a member of the committee of which I am chairman—that is, the Transport and Communications Committee—because at the last meeting of that committee one of its members asked me whether certain things could be done with reference to these very estimates, insofar as the item relates to VIA Rail.

I undertook to find out the legal position and asked the Law Clerk of the Senate for his view on that particular question. I obtained a written opinion from that eminent gentleman, a copy of which I caused to be sent today to the office of the senator in question, thinking that the senator would have it available should the senator wish to raise the question this evening. I see, however, that that honourable senator is not present this evening. It seemed to me that, having undertaken to obtain legal opinion, if I were to let this motion pass without comment, perhaps I would not be fulfilling my obligation to that senator who is a member of the committee.

I wonder, therefore, whether the Honourable Senator Everett has any objection to letting his motion stand until I have had an opportunity to communicate by telephone with that senator tomorrow. I should have done so today, but did not realize that the senator would not be present this evening.

Therefore, with the indulgence of Senator Everett and other honourable senators, I ask that the matter be allowed to stand until tomorrow, by which time I shall have had an opportunity to communicate to the senator the information I have been able to obtain.

Senator Everett: I know of no reason why this motion has to be adopted this evening. I assume that the honourable senator would like to adjourn the debate.

Senator Smith: Yes. I suppose I should so move.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: As to the consideration of the estimates, honourable senators, I should like to say that before coming here, I served for eight years in the other place as Chairman of the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. It was something of a novelty, for it had never existed before. In other words I was its first chairman. At first, when the other place had to deal with supplementary estimates, the house would refer the whole matter to the committee on supplementary estimates. As we were somewhat pressed for time to carry out the necessary study, I did send representations to the then Minister of Finance and the then President of the Treasury Board suggesting that the estimates be divided instead among the various committees which had a particular interest in them.

That is what eventually happened. Instead of all the estimates being referred to the same committee, they were divided for consideration purposes among various committees. When the schedule called for a review lasting only five or six days, this meant that about 10 committees were sitting at the same time to consider the estimates, while previously it had been the responsibility of a single committee to assume the burden of all these estimates over the same five or six days.

If I understand the suggestion of the Chairman of the Committee on National Finance, it might be possible at some point to divide certain areas of the supplementary estimates. I do not think that we are dealing now with the main estimates, but only with the supplementary estimates. This always creates a problem, because sometimes eight or nine departments are involved whereas in the case of the supplementary estimates perhaps only two are. We have now received supplementary estimates (D) in which only one or two departments are involved. The appropriation may vary, but the last time supplementary estimates came up for consideration they amounted to $4 billion, which is a fairly large amount. I have indicated that we might be short of time. We lacked adequate information to be able to pass judgment on the $4 billion asked for, although some of these supplementary estimates were due, of course, to higher interest rates.

The suggestion that the Committee on National Finance should consider the estimates as soon as they are received is a good one, I think. Now, if one of our committees finds in these estimates some particular problem, it could certainly ask the Senate for leave to look into it—I do not think that would pose any problem. As Senator Godfrey said a moment ago, I do not think it would be desirable to distribute the estimates among all the committees. I think it would be a good idea to refer them to the Committee on National Finance. We are looking into the matter at present. However, if another committee, for some reason or other, believes that it has a good point and wants to examine a particular case, I do not see any problem with that. So perhaps that is what I would recommend for now, that we continue to live with the existing problems. However, if on the other hand a committee feels really affected, then the Senate could authorize it to conduct a particular study at the same time as the Committee on National Finance.

● (2100)

[English]

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, if I may, I will comment on that. Senator Leblanc makes a good point. I was not suggesting we should parcel out the entire estimates to other committees. Indeed, I was referring to the main estimates, not the supplementaries.

Given the size of the estimates, it is difficult for a single committee to make an intensive study of them. The National Finance Committee can do a good job of overview. We can undertake an intensive examination of one department or one area of policy—and I think we do that well—but beyond that we really are just sort of poking at the estimates and asking random questions.

In the current fiscal year we are considering $70 billion of spending. Therefore, it seems to me that we should encourage other committees, with greater expertise than the National Finance Committee in specific areas, to study particular items in the estimates.

As I say, I was against this at first, but I am now a convert to it. It would be a different procedure from that in the other place in that it would not be an automatic referral. It would be subject to negotiation, and would be an attempt to improve our examination of the estimates in those areas in which individual committees can do as good a job as I think the National Finance Committee has been able to do in the specific examinations it has made.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, I would simply like to add, after the comments of the chairman of the Senate Committee on National Finance that what I suggested concerned rather supplementary estimates (A), (B) and (C). As far as the main estimates are concerned, I am in total agreement with Senator Everett, that everything be referred to the Committee on National Finance. However, there is a time restriction problem, and if certain committees feel they should examine certain estimates in particular, I think it would be quite appropriate that they do so concurrently and during the required period, which is already provided for in the Standing Orders, at the same time as we do. The Committee on National Finance could drop certain aspects of the estimates and proceed rather on the basis of a general scrutiny, which is what we are trying to do because it is very difficult to study in depth the various estimates put forward, since $70 billion are involved. However, in my view, the existing committees, such as the Committee on Transport and Communications and the Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, could certainly extract part of the main estimates and make a particular study of it if, of course, their terms of reference provide for the scrutiny of the main estimates.

On motion of Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 2, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., Hon. Renaude Lapointe, Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE ERNEST C. MANNING, P.C.

TRIBUTES UPON BEING NAMED FIRST MEMBER OF ORDER OF EXCELLENCE OF ALBERTA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will have received with great satisfaction the announcement from Edmonton that one of our colleagues, Honourable Senator Ernest Manning, has been named the first member of Alberta's Order of Excellence.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: The order was brought into being in 1979 and, according to the enabling act, is designed "to accord recognition to those persons who have rendered service of the greatest distinction and of singular excellence for, or on behalf of, the residents of Alberta."

All of us recognize the great contribution that Senator Manning has made not only to Alberta but to all of Canada—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: —and we commend him for the honour that has been bestowed on him by the Province of Alberta.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, our colleague, Senator Manning, is eminently worthy of the honour that has been bestowed on him. He has had a very remarkable and extraordinary career. I remember—I think I was just starting university at the time—when the Social Credit party came to power in Alberta. It was in 1935, and I had taken an interest in their philosophy, which has changed quite a bit, of course, since then. However, I found it particularly interesting to follow the career of Senator Manning, who became a minister in the Aberhart government when he was 26 or 27, if I remember correctly, and who was to succeed Aberhart at the age of 32.

To have been Premier of the Province of Alberta for 25 years is, I believe, a record in Canadian history, both federally and provincially. When Senator Manning joined us in the Senate, we were very pleased to welcome him as one of our colleagues, who was bringing us the fruits of his experience and wisdom.

[English]

We are very happy that this honour has been bestowed on our colleague, and we are most grateful for his experience and wisdom, of which we in this house are the beneficiaries. The recognition that his province has given him is something that should be repeated on the national scene.

It is only because he is a member of Parliament that he has not been made a member of the Order of Canada, but I am quite sure that will come in due course.

Senator Manning, please accept our very warm congratulations, and thank you again for the great contribution you have made to Canada.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, may I be permitted to join with my colleagues in the Senate in offering our congratulations to Senator Manning on this award, which was designed to recognize the kind of contribution he has made to the public good in Alberta.

It should be recalled, honourable senators, that Senator Manning and his colleagues assumed office in the middle of the worst depression that this country, and perhaps even the world, has ever known.

When he took office as head of his government, the financial situation of the Province of Alberta was more difficult than that of all the other provinces of Canada. By the time he had completed his term of office he had made Alberta a leader among the provinces in terms of economic well-being. I recall with a great deal of satisfaction the part he took in developing the policies that have put Alberta in its present strong social and economic position.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am glad that an opportunity is open to a person like me to join in these tributes to Ernest Manning.

● (1405)

I had the pleasure and privilege of sitting around a conference table with him from time to time when the federal Prime Minister and the provincial premiers used to meet. I see Senator Robichaud looking at me. He, too, was one of that happy band. In those days it seemed that we were able to conduct our affairs with somewhat less confrontation than there is today.

An Hon. Senator: Less results, too!

Senator Roblin: I would not say that.

One of the reasons for that happy spirit, as I recall it, is that contribution made by Senator Manning. His province, if my memory is correct, was the last to enter Confederation. Because we spoke in order of seniority, he always had the last word. I have to tell you that it was a very good last word, because he had a gift of summing up the difficulties with which we were confronted and of offering a solution which, on many occasions, appealed as being appropriate for the national interest. When I first attended one of those meetings, Senator Manning was, I think, the dean of the gathering; he certainly occupied that position when I left.

I should like to record the sterling contribution which, in my opinion, he made, not only to the conduct of affairs in Alberta but in bringing Alberta's view—indeed, in bringing a particularly conservative Canadian view, if you will allow me to use that adjective—to the problems that confronted us in those days.

I am happy, honourable senators, that Senator Manning is present to hear what we have to say about him, and I am happy to have a chance to add these few words.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, perhaps I will be forthright enough to take precedence over Premier Robichaud, as he then was, since my tenure of office as a provincial premier expired just as his began.

I, too, in my capacity as Premier of Nova Scotia, overlapped with Premier Manning for two years or thereabouts, and would like to associate myself with the things that have been said about him.

Perhaps in Canada we are a little too reticent in giving recognition by the awarding of orders of this kind to those who have served their country well. Certainly Ernest Manning is one who richly deserves the recognition that he has just received from the Province of Alberta. Indeed, that recognition, I am sure, is accorded to him by Canadians everywhere, not only in Alberta.

[Translation]

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, this kind of eloquent praise is, as a rule, not expressed at the end of a career but when the recipient is laid out in a funeral parlour! In this case, the ex-Premier of Alberta, Senator Manning, is alive and well and is eminently worthy of the honour that has just been bestowed on him.

[English]

I have had the honour to be his colleague for a little better than 10 years, and I am one of those who benefited from his wise counsel throughout that time.

I remember 1967 quite vividly, when he and his charming wife were in my home in Fredericton. We certainly enjoyed their company and, again, their sound counsel.

I have noted the remark of the Leader of the Opposition that unfortunately Senator Manning has not received the Order of Canada because he is a parliamentarian. I believe I should disagree with that comment because Senator Manning did, indeed, receive the Order of Canada.

Senator Flynn: He did? Yes, that was before he came to the Senate.

Senator Robichaud: Yes, in the period between his resignation as Premier of Alberta and his being summoned to the Senate he was awarded the Order of Canada.

I want to join with all of his colleagues in congratulating Senator Manning upon his being awarded the Order of Excellence of Alberta, and I wish him and his charming wife well.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, although I am the last of the group which has spoken to have had the honour of reaching that rank, I nevertheless had the opportunity to be a colleague of Senator Manning's for some time.

● (1410)

I should like very much to join in the tributes and congratulations so ably expressed by the distinguished senators who have preceded me. Not only during the relatively few years I spent as a fellow premier but also while attending first ministers' federal-provincial conferences from 1956 to 1968, when Senator Manning stepped down from office in Alberta, I had the pleasure of listening to his wisdom, wit and sound judgment on many occasions. I came to have the very highest regard for him in his understanding of the problems of this country and particularly of the problems which provinces have to face. Nothing I have seen since being privileged to join him in this house has ever led me to doubt the validity of the very high opinion of him I formed in those earlier years.

I join, therefore, with real enthusiasm in the congratulations which have been offered him, and I express my pride and happiness in having been privileged to be associated with him.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I am moved by, and am deeply appreciative of, the kind and generous words that have just been spoken. We sometimes wonder whether such recognition, which comes to all of us from time to time, particularly as we get older, is because of something we have done or because, as a result of the passing years, we are well known in our respective communities and our names come to mind when something of this kind is being considered.

With respect to this recognition granted by the Province of Alberta, I am quite certain there are many people in Alberta who are equally deserving, and I regard the tribute that was paid to me as representing an equal tribute to them.

I do want to thank the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition and Senator Olson. I also wish to thank those senators who were colleagues of mine for so long when we had the mutual privilege of serving as provincial premiers.

To all of you, again I want to say how very deeply I appreciate your kindness in taking time out of the schedule this afternoon to express such kind words. Thank you very much.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—
MOTION RESPECTING RECORDING OF DIVISIONS ON AMENDMENTS ADOPTED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to put a motion with respect to the voting on amendments to the resolution on the Constitution. Pursuant to the discussion, understanding and leave that was granted yesterday, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move:

That any recorded division demanded on any amendment proposed to the motion of the Leader of the Government in the Senate for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada be deferred until the conclusion of the debate on the said motion.

Honourable senators, I showed a copy of this motion, in draft form, to the Honourable Leader of the Opposition an hour or so ago.

● (1415)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we shall have to devise a method for following this procedure. I suppose that an amendment having been moved, the ensuing debate would have to be relevant to that amendment. Once the debate on an amendment is concluded, perhaps a question could be put to introduce other amendments, and there should be agreement that a senator cannot speak twice on the same amendment, although he or she may speak on each amendment and on the resolution. In any event, that is one question we should perhaps address, either tomorrow or in the days to come.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition. I think that we can arrive at an orderly procedure without necessarily making that procedure the subject of an order.

Looking ahead to the presentation of amendments, I suggest that we follow the procedure which has been followed both here and in the other place in the past; namely, that once amendments are put, debated and deferred pursuant to this order, they appear in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate in chronological sequence. If we all agree that it is convenient to do so, then we would put those amendments in the order in which they were put—which would then be in reverse order of time—at the end of the debate.

There is no need to commit ourselves to this procedure at this moment. I suggest it as an example of an orderly way in which we could put this order into effect.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

TAXATION OF NORTHERN BENEFITS

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State. It was announced during the budget speech that the moratorium on taxation of northern benefits would be extended to January 1, 1983, an announcement which pleased all people in the north. It is now important that a permanent plan be implemented to assist the people who are prepared to help develop the more remote parts of Canada. My question is: Will a group, or committee, be structured soon to make recommendations to cabinet on this matter; and, if so, will northerners be involved in any discussions which will take place?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I noted with pleasure that in the budget address the Minister of Finance did not remove the moratorium which preserves benefits for remote communities, including those of the north. As Senator Lucier has indicated, the Minister of Finance has given notice that this moratorium will be extended through 1982.

I can assure the honourable senator that I shall pay assiduous attention to the question of encouraging people to work in remote and isolated communities far away from the comforts of the main centres, and that I will be delighted to keep in close touch with him on this matter. At this point, I cannot say what procedural steps will be taken by the Government of Canada.

SPEECH BY PRIME MINISTER AT FUND-RAISING DINNER IN VANCOUVER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Last week, in his infamous speech in Vancouver, the Prime Minister described the budget as "transitory." Would the minister assure this chamber that the Prime Minister was indeed correct when he said that the budget was transitory and that it will be repealed before there is complete chaotic collapse of the economy?

An Hon. Senator: Don't answer him.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, somebody behind me has said that I should not bother to answer the honourable senator. However, I presume the question was put seriously and that it deserves a serious answer. If it was not put seriously, then my honourable friend knows what he can do with the reply. I would like to look at the context in which the statement to which the honourable senator has referred was made, if it was made. Then I shall reply. I am sure, though, that the statement was not as encompassing as the preamble to the honourable senator's question would indicate.

● (1420)

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Last weekend Ontario federal Liberal supporters met in Toronto and, encouraged by Jim Coutts, passed a motion requesting that the budget be reconsidered because it encouraged high interest rates and inflation, and failed to deal with job creation. Is the government prepared to listen to Mr. Coutts and the other grass-roots elements and to reconsider the budget?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance made the following statement in the other place on November 18:

I would be pleased to consider any suggestion that would enhance the equity I am attempting to create within the tax system.

The Liberal Party has, as one of its strengths, the ability to listen to its grass-roots members on an ongoing basis. Therefore, while I do not agree with some of the criticism that has been reported from that meeting, I would say that this party does, in fact, take the grass-roots membership seriously, and when such members criticize actions this government has taken, such criticism is taken into consideration.

Hon. Jack Marshall: As a supplementary, while we are speaking of the Minister of Finance, I would refer the Leader of the Government to the headline to an article on the sports page in today's Globe and Mail, which reads, "Deputy Minister picked Canadian horse of the year." Since I have not had an opportunity to read the entire article, would the leader confirm the rumour that the article refers to the Deputy Minister of Finance?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I rather think that, as a knowledgeable Albertan, Senator Olson may be more knowledgeable about horses and the racing community than I am. I was rather disquieted to read in today's Globe and Mail the headline quoted by Senator Marshall.

However, I did have an opportunity to read the first paragraph which states:

The 2-year-old Deputy Minister, the son of a mare once claimed for $6,250, has been voted the Canadian thoroughbred horse of the year for 1981.

The horse received 19 out of 20 votes in the Daily Racing Form poll. "Deputy Minister" is a Canadian horse with excellent blood lines. The headline, then, does not allude to any person working on behalf of the government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RESCUE OF CREW OF EURO PRINCESS—COMMENDATION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Now, honourable senators, headlong into the sublime. I notice that in the other place on Friday there was a unanimous expression of commendation for the rescue at sea of the 26 crew members of Euro Princess. That rescue will clearly go down in history as one of the most efficient and one of the bravest operations.

Would the Leader of the Government convey to the Minister of National Defence an expression of the high regard in which we hold these most excellent members of the Canadian Forces? I am only sorry that Captain Donald Macquarrie is not a relative. I wish he were.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): May I say that the Honourable Senator Macquarrie's remarks are most appropriate and are supported by all members of this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

INDIAN ACT

STATUS OF WOMEN—REMOVAL OF DISCRIMINATORY PROVISIONS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State who, so far as I am told, has some responsibility for the affairs of the aboriginal people of Canada. Would he inform this chamber whether it is true that the government has decided to postpone for a year any legislation intended to remove from the Indian Act those provisions which have been found by the United Nations to be discriminatory against women?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I shall have to make substantive inquiries to ascertain whether the postponement is for a year. However, the government has decided to look carefully into the question of the cost to the communities of an early introduction of this legislation in order to provide as much mitigation of the difficulties of introducing that very important principle.

● (1425)

Senator Smith: I have a supplementary, honourable senators. I am not quite clear about the honourable gentleman's reference to costs. Is he talking about costs to the Government of Canada and, therefore, the people of Canada, or is he talking about costs to particular bands or groups of Indians?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Smith for giving me the opportunity to clarify my answer. I am specifically talking about the costs to residents of Indian communities in Canada so that we may receive their specific concerns and recommendations with respect to a program of mitigation.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I have another supplementary, if I may. I can well understand the question of wanting to have consultation, even though that particular idea seems to have sprung late to the mind of the government, but I would have thought that any costs involved in something of this nature would properly be public costs. In any event, perhaps the minister would be kind enough to say what costs, so far as his present knowledge extends, are likely to be involved in the removal of any such discrimination.

Senator Austin: There are adjustment costs to the communities involved, and it may indeed be, as Senator Smith says, ultimately the representations of those communities that the federal government should bear some or all of the adjustment costs. I cannot satisfy Senator Smith with respect to the details at this time, but I can assure him that if his interest is sustained I will advise him of the steps the government is taking as soon as I have the information.

Senator Smith: I thank the minister, and I think my interest will likely be sustained for some time. However, just to repeat what I was asking him in my last supplementary, it was, primarily, what kinds of costs are likely to be involved in removing this discriminatory provision of the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Austin: Without getting into a long, extensive or comprehensive discussion of this matter, by way of an illustration, should Parliament pass a law allowing female Indian persons the same right of access to Indian lands and entitlement for residence there, then there will be costs of settling those people on those lands, it being assumed that those people are not now in residence there and seeking access and status. The common wealth of the band—that is, its joint assets and entitlements—may be proportioned in a different way than now exists and, therefore, they could require divesting of vested interests. These are questions that must be examined carefully, and as I have the assurance of Senator Smith of his sustained interest, I will seek further information and advise him.

THE SENATE

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS—PRINTING OF WRITTEN QUESTIONS

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I was going to direct a question to Senator Graham in his capacity as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration but I note that he has just left the chamber. I would ask that we revert to Question Period when Senator Graham returns so I can ask my question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think Senator Godfrey should put the question on the record, and if Senator Graham returns to the chamber and wishes to reply to it, we can give leave.

Senator Godfrey: I wanted to extend to him the courtesy of posing the question while he is present. However, I will put it on the record.

On May 20, 1981, I asked a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I referred to a memorandum which Mr. Richard Greene had sent to the then Speaker on January 24, 1980, in connection with the printing of Hansard. He made four recommendations, three of which I can recall offhand. One was that written questions not be printed every day but once a week, as in the House of Commons; secondly, that notices of committee meetings not list the witnesses and be reduced in size to occupy one page; and, thirdly, that the reports of committees not be printed in both Hansard and the Minutes of the Proceedings.

● (1430)

The matter was referred to the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee, which met on May 28. I was present at that meeting, but Senator Graham was not. We discussed the matter in detail and approved the first two suggestions that I mentioned. The third suggestion was turned down. I felt strongly that the reports of committees were so important that they should be given wider publicity and should be printed in both Hansard and the Minutes of the Proceedings.

Nothing happened. For example, we still kept on printing the questions every day, and not once a week as had been approved by the committee. I made inquiries, and evidently Senator Graham had other ideas when he was advised of the decision of the committee, and the report was held up. Then, only July 9, the report was rescinded because he wanted to get more information about costs.

I have spoken to Senator Graham from time to time—at least a half a dozen times—and I have said, “Why could we not at least go ahead on the first two suggestions that were approved? When are you going to bring in the report?”, and so on. I started to threaten him with going public; that if we were not to get some kind of action, I would ask a question in the Senate. So here it is. My question is: Why cannot we go ahead with the first two recommendations made nearly two years ago by Mr. Greene, and approved six months ago, and, with regard to any other suggestion he has, why does it take six months to get cost estimates which he says he has been waiting for?

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MANITOBA—WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND ALLOCATIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question asked by Senator Roblin on November 25, concerning the Western Development Fund.

I suggest that the honourable senator refer to the first paragraph on page 20 of the document entitled The Budget in More Detail, tabled by the Minister of Finance on November 12.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What page, please?

Senator Olson: Page 20, the first paragraph. The details requested by the honourable senator are provided in that paragraph.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I could ask a supplementary question. I have had an opportunity to read this paragraph a couple of times to try to satisfy myself as to what it truly meant. I have tried to reduce the information to tabular form, but it seems to clearly indicate that there has been pretty extensive gutting of the Western Development Fund.

GRAIN

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—COMPENSATION TO FARMERS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I asked another question about the Western Development Fund, to which I have not received a reply. It had to do with the $81 million that was set aside to compensate farmers for losses they suffered under the embargo on extra grain shipments to the Soviet Union after the 1979 invasion of Afghanistan. My question was whether that sum was included as part of the Western Development Fund. Perhaps I may receive an answer to that.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes. I cannot at this moment find the exact paragraph, but I know that it is stated in the budget papers.

Senator Roblin: Is it not true that the original appropriation of this sum was in the supplementary estimates and had nothing to do with the Western Development Fund? If that is the case, why the transfer?

Senator Olson: Well, my honourable friend knows that we need supplementary estimates to pay the $81 million, or any other amount when it is actually paid, no matter how it is identified as a source of funds when the budget is made.

Senator Roblin: I guess I have to associate myself with the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture when he was asked about this matter. He is reported as saying they would have to put it in big boxcar print to say that it came from the Western Development Fund, and I merely associate myself with that common-sense observation.

CANADA—UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information on the subject of the Garrison diversion. Some of it will already be known to honourable senators, but it may represent an "update". It relates to the Burdick amendment. Apparently, honourable senators have received the information.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): My impression is that the matter was dealt with last week by the Deputy Leader of the Government—not to my satisfaction, I might say.

THE ESTIMATES

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Everett, seconded by the Honourable Senator Riley, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, last night I moved the adjournment of this debate because a certain member of the committee had asked me for information, which I have since provided. The senator is not in the chamber today, but I have ascertained that he will be here tomorrow. Therefore, I would seek the indulgence of the Senate, with the concurrence of Senator Everett, to again let this matter stand for the reason I have mentioned.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Order stands.

EDUCATION

CONCERN FOR FUTURE OF POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Heath Macquarrie rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, October 29, 1981:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the widespread expressions of concern from educational leaders concerning the future of post-secondary institutions in Canada, in particular with reference to governmental grants.

He said: Honourable senators, I am upstanding and I will deliver that which no doubt some of you have been fearful of for all the days it has been standing on the order paper. All of us being somewhat political, no doubt we have had the experience of going to nominating conventions as the guest speaker, and we know the favourite slot they give you just after they start the balloting, and how terribly interested everyone is in what you are saying when they really want to know who is going to be the candidate. So you fight that for however long it takes—

Hon. Lowell Murray: Ah yes, but it keeps them there for the speech.

Senator Macquarrie: My canny political organizer here, Senator Murray, says "Ah yes, but it keeps them there for the speech." But I am not going to fill in all the time until those in the other place have finished all their votes. I give honourable senators that assurance. While I do not pretend that I would be very successful in courting popularity, I am not going so far the other way, either.

I do not believe that the subject of my inquiry is in any way oblique or off the track to a legislative body which is concerned about constitutional matters. The constitutional discussion is, of course, very much to the forefront of our thinking. This subject matter strikes me as being one of those practical and essential functions of a federal state. That is why people were so wrong when they saw no merit in the British North America Act, because its great flexibility allowed for the kind of arrangements that were entered into by governments in the past and over many years to handle some very important problems that mean so much to people; and there is nothing much more important than the care of the old and the education of the young—and now indeed, in the days of adult education, the young and the old.

We know from our history that while it is said that the British North America Act is a rigid, formal document, it was only months after Sir John A. Macdonald became Prime Minister that functional changes were made in it, because it was discovered that some of the functions indeed simply had to have larger subsidies, and some of the politicians would not come his way unless those large subsidies were made available.

● (1440)

Former Premier Smith knows which was the first province to make up a new and better bargain. Prince Edward Island did a lot of dilly-dallying, too, until it had some changes made.

I am not referring to structural changes in the document, but certainly to great changes in its function.

It is a simplistic observation concerning our country and its Constitution that in 1864 it was the inexpensive operations that were given to the provinces. Our lifestyle has now changed, and it turns out that today very few people are building new railways. I do not know whether the Prime Minister is going to double-track the west or not, but while there is not much railroad building going on, a lot of very expensive highways are being put in.

Great changes, therefore, had to be made, and as a consequence the federal government has long been assisting the provinces in the discharge of their duties. That is why the federal government got into building roads. With good, careful arrangements they left the jurisdiction where it was put by the British North America Act, but made it possible for the provinces to have sufficient funds to discharge their obligations.

I remember when education was very much a role sacred to the provinces alone, until it became so costly that the provinces could not afford it, and the federal government then moved into that domain. I recall that it was quite a shock when the federal government became involved in university grants. We know that some of the provinces were reluctant to accept those grants. As a Prince Edward Islander I could never understand any province that would not accept grants from Ottawa. We never had any nonsense of that kind. There were other provinces, however, that worried about their sacred jurisdictions, and I can quite well remember a very important summit meeting between Premier Duplessis and Prime Minister St. Laurent, on neutral territory; indeed, if I recall correctly, in the city of Montreal. There was an accommodation, and as a student and former professor at McGill University, I was very glad there was. I thought it was a very good thing to have some funds from Ottawa. That is all very important.

I was pleased that the task force under Mr. Breau, of the other place, in their report entitled "Fiscal Federalism in Canada", included digests of one of the most important documents in the whole of Canadian history, let alone in Canadian constitutional history, namely, the Rowell-Sirois report.

I was always brought up to believe that if possible you should try to find something good in people. I could never find anything good in Mackenzie King until that point. I think that the opening up of jurisdictional roles, the introduction of flexibility, and the invocation of the principle—which is even more important—that Canadians, no matter where they live, should have a similar, decent standard of services from their government, and that no one should suffer because the province he was living in did not have great natural resources, were great concepts. It is probably great enough to lead me to forgive all the other iniquities of Mackenzie King, and he had plenty of them.

It was wise, I believe, on the part of the task force of the other place, to recall that to us. I think it was also extremely wise of them to look at what the government was planning with reference to education and to warn them not to do it. I would not have had this inquiry up today had the government listened to the task force. I think there would be much less turmoil and much less anxiety in the educational institutions across the land had the government left that situation the way it was.

There are times in life when the most dangerous man around is the tinkerer who is convinced that things have to be changed and altered. What we should be doing is looking at existing institutions and not only making them work, but making them work better. You do not always have to throw everything out. We have so many formulae coming out of our bureaucracy today that I doubt if the bureaucrats understand them themselves. I hear Senator Roblin, Senator Doody, Senator Murray and the rest of my colleagues asking questions about the budget. I am not sure if the people who wrote that budget really know what they put together.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): They are learning.

Senator Macquarrie: They are learning, but they are learning slowly.

I was shocked to discover—and Senator Roblin elucidated this with his usual skill and erudition the other day—that when Mr. MacEachen went down to meet with the provincial treasurers he said, "Excuse me. We have made a little boo-boo here. We are out by $700 million." Senator Roblin said, "That is one mistake," and asked, "Are there others?" It is conceivable.

I hear that the meeting of the federal and provincial people to discuss this matter in Halifax was somewhat confusing. I hear that each delegation came in with a cart, such as they use in grocery stores, filled with documents. The documents and the ministers met, and I understand that complexity and confusion were very much in evidence all over the old Lord Nelson Hotel.

The Minister of Finance is a most excellent man when he is not political. It is too bad he is such a political animal, and, of course, he is nearly always political. He is also an expert in obfuscation, and if he wanted to display that attribute to the provincial treasurers, he could certainly do a good job of it. There is to be another meeting.

While there is some confusion, there is no lack of unanimity, because, as I mentioned to the government leader here, every provincial treasurer is dissatisfied, whether they come from the rich provinces or the poor.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Are they ever satisfied?

Senator Macquarrie: Well, we will wax philosophical later, senator, on that point. I suppose there are very few of them who would not like a little more. Charles Dickens had that down to rights long ago, with, "Please, sir, I want some more."

I think it would be prudent and salutary to note that on this subject they are all upset, and it is not just that they want more, but that they think the planned alteration is not going to help. They feel this because they know what is the prevailing tone among the educators of Canada. No one in the last six months could be anything but disturbed by what we read and hear. On Sunday, for example, I heard a very upsetting report from Montreal that at the University of Montreal 100 professors have not received their rehiring notices. As a consequence, they are in a state of great uncertainty. Their careers may be very badly damaged. Furthermore, the amount of the deficit at that university is enormous. I single it out, not as an exception, but as an example.

We read also that perhaps ten universities in Ontario may have to close. We know there are special problems in Ontario. Perhaps too many universities were built in the last score of years. Perhaps expectations as to the student population were too great. In addition to these matters—and this prevails in every province—the operating costs of universities have become enormous, and their base for financial expansion, as senators know, is very limited. There is very little room for expansion, for instance, in student fees. The government leader has often talked about my party trying to raise fears in the land.

● (1450)

Senator Perrault: Yes, that is right.

Senator Macquarrie: I can tell him exactly where that started. It started with the young students of my party.

Senator Perrault: After you talked to them.

Senator Macquarrie: They know what is going to happen. I give credit to young students who care, who are fearful that they, their fellows or their successors will be denied an opportunity for higher learning because of financial reasons. They should care. They demonstrated initiative in sending out an information bulletin—not propaganda—so that others in the student bodies across the land could take counsel, could take action and could get in touch with their political people. A good many of the students have done so. I commend these young people for this action. It is self-interest, but it is enlightened. That is what we have heard characterized as vicious propaganda.

The students are concerned, and rightly so. To substantiate that, we can only look at what the educators say, and I quote Bette Stephenson, the Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities:

Universities should be prepared for major changes in tuition fees and faculty size—

In other words, the former will go up while the latter will go down; the size of the faculties will diminish.

—if the federal government reduces its share of financing for post-secondary education.

I read from the Ottawa Citizen:

Educators blame federal government for funding crisis.

Educators say the Liberal government is to blame for the federal-provincial funding crisis that threatens to cripple the country's universities.

"We warned them it (the crisis) would happen and the university presidents warned them," Richard Bellaire of the Canadian Association of University Teachers says.

"But they went ahead with their plan and we feel like the innocent party that is going to be used as the whipping boy as they madly try to fix it."

What are they trying to fix? One stated objective of the government is that the deficit must be cut; expenditures must be cut. Rather than being the last people to be affected by such measures, university students and the elderly were among the first.

Another element which I see reflected in the answers given by the Leader of the Government—and I hope he will take part in this inquiry; I would very much like to hear him—is this confrontation between the two jurisdictions. It is a question of credit, a question of pride. I am not incapable of understanding that. There are times when provincial people are perhaps a little too niggardly. They might be administering funds, but perhaps they forget that 90 per cent of those funds comes from somewhere else.

I am sure that we all remember a certain bridge that was built under trans-Canada highway legislation, 90 per cent of which was funded by the federal government. The provincial people thought it would be nice to name the bridge after the premier of the province. This element exists. There is no one who would quarrel with seeking some way to have credit given where credit is due. That is fine, but in this case there is a little more to it than that.

I hope that this unwelcome, frightening budgetary change has not developed because of the dearth of provincial Liberal governments in the country. I hope that co-operative federalism has not reached that stage. I would not mention this point if I did not remember, as a boy, listening to Mackenzie King saying, "Not a five cent piece to a Tory province. We might give a little to those who elect a Progressive or a United Farmers government, but not a five cent piece to a Tory province." He was challenged on that remark, and he replied, "Not a one cent piece to a Tory province." Some people say that was the only unequivocal statement he ever made. In any event, it was a humdinger and it was worth a lot of votes for R. B. Bennett in 1930. Again, that was one of the few years when my party won an election. Perhaps I have reached my quota now; I have gone through three victories in 62 years.

However, this competition which has become so political, so partisan—the attitude that "we are going to put these Tory guys in their place"—is a disturbing element. I just hope that such an attitude does not lie at the bottom of the policy of the federal government. Who cares about getting the credit as long as the students get universities? That is my feeling.

We have a proud educational tradition in this country. We have fine institutions of learning. We have great scholars. Canada is one of the most blessed countries in the entire world, yet I am troubled as I go from university to university. I rarely run across a cheerful administrator. A couple of times out in Alberta I have found people to be fairly relaxed about things, but even they have problems related to staffing, cut-backs and so on. It is a time of crisis for the universities. If the administrators are upset, naturally that is reflected in the faculties and the student bodies.

A more dangerous aspect of the direction in which we seem to be moving is that not only does the dominion jurisdiction want credit, they would also like to have some control. We seem to be moving towards a national education system whereby, through financial grants, Ottawa could have undue influence upon the courses open to students. For example, if a student took a type of engineering or an exploration geology course, he could get a good, big grant; whereas if he fooled around with theology, political science or philosophy, it's just too bad, he would have to go to the province for support. This sort of thing is being revealed in statements and in documents. The university people are noting it. I say that this is a dangerous development. I only hope that it is noted in time.

I read, in a Winnipeg Free Press of recent date, an editorial entitled: "Keep Ottawa Out of School." That is salutary; it is a warning that we should heed. We should not bring about a national system of education through fiduciary and foul means.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): "Stay home, but put the money under the door!"

Senator Macquarrie: That sounds far more surreptitious than anything I would be capable of, Senator Frith.

I say that we ought to leave to those authorities which are doing quite a good job the job which they are doing. I do not believe the provinces have the idea that they can manage every program better than the federal government can. That is nonsense. I have seen many fiascos created in provincial regimes. However, the provinces have been handling education for years; indeed, their responsibility in this area goes back further than Confederation. Unless there is something wrong with that, that is where the responsibility should remain. If there is any regard for public opinion, that is where the public wants it to remain. Certainly the educators do. There is sufficient wisdom in our system to provide an acceptable formula to assist the provinces in the burden of education. That is why I began with the Rowell-Sirois Report. At best, what the Minister of Finance is putting forward is almost incomprehensible. I think it is also iniquitous. But it surely must also be unnecessary, because we are told, when we say, "This is wrong. You are cutting back," "No, no; we are not. You are getting as much money as ever before." If that is the case, it is hardly a revenue-saving operation. What then is it for? I don't think the provincial treasurers know. I don't think that they are being told. Perhaps it is impossible to get this across.

● (1500)

I feel about this subject somewhat like I felt in my second last election, when people were asking me what "prices and incomes policy" meant. That is a policy my party advocated and somebody else's party implemented. It took me a long time to answer those questions. My wife—she was my best supporter—said, "A lot of people don't understand that prices and incomes policy," and then with great cogency she said, "Are you sure you do?"

After that campaign was over I was not sure what the answer was. In any event, I lost a good many hundreds of votes over that issue, and the election was over by the time I had it explained, even to my own satisfaction. But the penetration of the mystery of Halifax still challenges me. The more documents I get, the harder it becomes to know what they were talking about. The more questions I ask, the heavier becomes the cloud of confusion. That is why I have to get back to basic principles—questions of federalism, questions respecting the jurisdiction of the provinces in a field in which they have proven their competence, a field the brutal changing of which would make for great damage in this country.

My basic interest is in the students. I think that to raise this threat is bad enough, but to execute it is worse.

Somehow I sound like a Tory today. I am not one of those people who always think that institutions have to be changed and thrown out. I am not terribly impressed by Senate reform. I think the Senate, in its present functions, can do a great many more things than it is doing, and can perform an even greater role than it does; but it strikes me that a scrutiny of this sort of thing is an ideal challenge for the Senate of Canada. We believe, and others say, that we are the protectors of the provinces and of the regions and of the minorities. We have expertise in many fields. In this chamber there are former university presidents, professors, educators, university trustees, and members of boards of governors of universities. I hope we will have a wide-ranging debate. I expect to hear from the distinguished former president of Dalhousie University, from Senator Rowe, an educator of great eminence. I hope the minister will give the position of the government, and I am quite prepared to listen to him. It is possible that the treasurers are wrong, and it is even possible that I am wrong.

Senator Perrault: We will note the occasion.

Senator Macquarrie: It may have happened.

Senator Frith: Let's not go that far yet.

Senator Macquarrie: I cannot recall the occasion all that quickly, but of course it has happened.

I think this is a field for the Senate. It is an area we should be looking into. I do not pretend to have been able to give you all the answers today, honourable senators.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Most of them.

Senator Macquarrie: Thank you, Senator Marshall. I have just tried to open out the subject for inquiry, for discussion, for debate.

I am a great believer in what Mr. Pearson said, and what the task force was very wise in quoting. When Mr. Pearson was talking about the whole realm of shared-cost transfers and used that very apt expression "co-operative federalism," he said:

The approach we are proposing rests on an awareness of the extraordinary financial requirements for higher education in the years ahead, together with a recognition of provincial jurisdiction over education.

Essentially, that is what must be our continuing theme and our abiding goal. The federal government, because it has the resources, which the provinces need, and in many cases need seriously, can assist; but the respect for jurisdiction is an essential of the whole thing.

I look forward to learning the views of other senators on this important matter.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have some facts which may be welcomed by members of this chamber, perhaps even by certain opposition members.

Senator Macquarrie has made an interesting speech this afternoon on the subject of post-secondary education. I do not think it has been a convincing speech. The opposition flights of fancy on this subject have, I think, developed "engine trouble."

The fact is that the federal government has been most generous in its support of post-secondary education, in respect of the universities in its support for research and other projects, in respect of vocational schools and other institutions.

Probably the best-kept secret in Canada today is the manner in which post-secondary institutions, universities and colleges are funded. Under the B.N.A. Act the provinces have the responsibility for education. They carry out that responsibility at the elementary and secondary levels, but when it comes to post-secondary institutions it is an entirely different story.

Federal involvement in the funding of post-secondary institutions began as long ago as 1876 with the establishment of the Royal Military College. In the early part of this century the federal government provided agricultural and vocational assistance to the provinces and student loans to veterans of World War I. That was one of the most generous programs of any country in the world, as the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, I am sure, would be most pleased to concede.

During the 1940s the emphasis shifted to support of the educational system as a contribution to the war effort, and afterwards to the training of veterans. Those were outstanding programs. They were initiated by Liberal governments.

In 1951-52 a program of direct federal support to the universities for operating purposes was begun. Again that was a Liberal program. By 1967 the federal payment had risen from 50 cents per capita to $5 per capita of provincial population.

In 1967 the funding system was changed from direct payments to institutions to payments to the provinces, the federal contribution being 50 per cent of eligible post-secondary operating expenses, or $15 per capita of provincial population, whichever was higher. At the same time the provincial share decreased to about 40 per cent. That was the beginning of the decline in the percentage support of post-secondary education by the provincial governments.

By 1972 a 15 per cent maximum was placed on the annual growth rate of the federal contribution. In 1973 the federal government proposed that the transfers be linked to the size of the population in the 18 to 24 years of age bracket of each province in order to create a simpler and more equitable system, but that plan was rejected by the provinces. I am sure that Senator Macquarrie will recall that incident. The system encouraged provinces to spend fifty-cent dollars, and it was also unfair, it was felt, to the poorer provinces.

• (1510)

In June 1976 the established programs financing proposal was established at a federal-provincial conference. In addition to generous direct transfers under the established programs financing arrangements, the federal government has also provided another $2.1 billion for fiscal 1980-81 through a variety of direct grants and funding for such things as Canada student loans, student aid and scholarships, medical research, manpower training, which received by far the largest amount in 1980-81, $800 million, language training, education for native persons, nurses' education, military colleges, social sciences and humanities research, natural sciences and engineering research, and other departmental expenditures on education.

There have been a number of studies on the whole question of federal government involvement in post-secondary education. The Royal Commission on Dominion-Provincial Relations of 1940 argued for a federal role in university education because the "efficient functioning" of universities in all provinces was essential to regional equality of influence in national life.

The Massey-Levesque Commission of 1951 expanded on the principle and was the impetus for the introduction of direct federal grants to universities. Most recently, an all-party Parliamentary Task Force on Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements, the so-called Breau report, has examined federal funding of post-secondary education. The report contains what is perhaps the understatement of the year, which can be found on page 132 of the report. It reads:

—there is no doubt that federal action over the years—

Inspired by Liberal governments, honourable senators.

—in one way or another, has underwritten provincial financing of higher education to a remarkable degree.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister has said, in response to a question on the Breau report, that if the federal government had billions of dollars in surplus funds it could continue to be generous to the provincial governments, but it is only reasonable that these costs be shared more evenly between the two levels of government, and that provincial governments ought to do more in an area which falls entirely within their own jurisdiction.

At present there are approximately 1.5 million full and part-time students in post-secondary institutions across the country. It would be very surprising if even a tiny percentage of them were aware of the extent of the federal support in post-secondary education and the fact that we are paying by far the greatest share for educational facilities which they enjoy.

Honourable senators, despite the vigorous efforts on the part of the opposition to cloud the issue and to cause misunderstanding, and because of the well-funded, Conservative campaign on the campuses across Canada, the Canadian people should be made aware of the facts, and they should be made aware of the system of funding of post-secondary education and the role the federal government plays in this crucial area of our national life. I have heard all kinds of "horror stories" about how the federal government allegedly wants to "slash its contributions to post-secondary education". Opposition spokesmen have repeated this line, not only in this chamber but in the other place. The Leader of the Conservative Party said the other day:

He (the Minister of Finance) told the parliamentary task force on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements that he intended to cut his obligation to the provinces by only $1.5 billion in transfer payments for health, post-secondary education, social assistance and social services in 1982-83 and 1983-84.

It is the same line as has been pursued in this chamber by the opposition. Mr. Clark went on to say:

The truth is that he was preparing to cut that obligation by $1.9 billion during that period and a further $3.8 billion during the next three years.

Let us put the facts on the record. The Minister of Finance never said that $1.5 billion would be cut from transfers to the provincial governments for health care and post-secondary education. The proposals tabled with the budget do not propose savings to federal transfers for health and post-secondary education. Contributions to the provinces for these purposes are estimated to grow from $11.4 billion in 1982-83 to $19 billion in 1986-87, which is a rate of growth of 13.4 per cent. If that is a description of a "cut back", then we need some revised definitions in the dictionary.

Under the proposals, total transfers, including equalization and established programs financing are estimated to rise from $16 billion in 1982-83 to $26 billion in 1986-87, a $10 billion increase in four fiscal years. The rate of growth will be at least as great as the rate of growth in overall federal spending.

The Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition refers to savings which will be realized by the elimination of revenue guarantees for the period up to and including 1983-84. The savings from the elimination of the revenue guarantee will be offset almost completely by increased revenue to the provinces. These are the facts which should be circulated and made known to the Canadian people. If the provinces parallel the federal changes in the tax base, they will receive an estimated $3.8 billion in additional revenue over the five-year period. This will reduce the net impact of the revenue guarantee savings to $1.9 billion over the next five years.

For the honourable senator from Prince Edward Island, I have some information which will contradict the alleged parsimonious attitude of the federal government towards that great Canadian province. In 1974-75 the federal government contributed 69 per cent of all post-secondary operating expenditure financing for the province, $5,260,000. The amount has been increased substantially. Today it stands at 110 per cent. Under the revised program, the total operating expenditures for post-secondary education in the province of Prince Edward Island for fiscal year 1981-82 are expected to be $14,904,000. The federal government is contributing $16,443,000 to that province for post-secondary education, or 110 per cent under a system which should obviously be revised and changed.

I also have figures for other Canadian provinces which I would be prepared to share with honourable senators. They can judge for themselves whether or not the federal government has been starving the post-secondary education institutions in this country. In the fiscal year 1974-75 the federal percentage of contribution throughout the country was 47.26 per cent, which represents approximately $1.344 billion. In the fiscal year 1981-82, $3,192 billion, or 56.15 per cent, will be the federal government's contribution. The provincial contributions in 1974-75 amounted to 35.36 per cent, representing $1.006 billion. For the fiscal year 1981-82 the provincial contributions slid to 29.12 per cent, amounting to $1.65 billion. Approximately 56 per cent of all post-secondary education operating expenditures are funded by the federal government, 29 per cent are provided by provincial governments, and 14.3 per cent derive from other sources.

In my own province of British Columbia, which is one of the so-called "have" provinces, according to all of the criteria which we have developed, the provincial share of institutional operating expenditures has dropped from 39 per cent in 1974-75 to 33.31 per cent in fiscal 1981-82. Education is paid for from three sources. As honourable senators are aware, there is federal funding, provincial funding and tuition fee funding of post-secondary education. This is no mystery, but a fact which is known to all senators. Since the Established Programs Financing Agreement covering funding arrangements for higher education and health care was signed with the provinces, the federal share of university funding has risen dramatically and the provincial share has dropped equally dramatically.

Federal funding for post-secondary education has risen in both percentage and real terms in recent years, while provincial funding has declined, even in provinces with a far more satisfactory deficit situation than we have federally. Day after day in this chamber we hear about the unsatisfactory federal deficit of $12 billion. Expressions of shock and alarm are uttered by members of the opposition.

As I said before, when we attempt to re-assess some of these programs to make certain that the burden is being fairly carried by provincial and federal levels of government, we are accused of "cutting back." The allegation has been made that the university presidents of Canada are universally opposed to what are alleged to be these federal "cutbacks." I have more respect for the university presidents of this country than to charge them with accusing the federal government of failing to support educational institutions.

Honourable senators, a few moments ago I made reference to other forms of aid to various types of education. In 1977-78, elementary and secondary education support involving the Department of National Defence, film strips, school broadcasts, Canadian correctional services and so on, amounted to $324 million. That figure went up to $416.9 million in 1981-82.

The federal government also supports post-secondary education in Nova Scotia at the Coast Guard College, and the Registered Nurses' Education Program in hospitals. The cost of loans to students, student aid, and other ministerial expenditures rose from $33.7 million in 1977-78 to $79.7 in 1981-82.

The federal government not only supports university education, but education in military colleges, which was not referred to by Senator Macquarrie. Expenditures in regard to manpower training have gone up from $618 million in 1977-78 to $850 million in 1981-82.

I am not talking, then, about assistance only for universities; I am talking about assistance to other forms of post-secondary education.

Hon. G. I. Smith: For federal purposes.

Senator Perrault: I am speaking now of supplementary support by the federal government for other forms of education. Whether the federal involvement is provincial or federal, I am putting the facts on the record.

Senator Smith: I wish they were facts.

Senator Perrault: There have been too many distortions.

Senator Smith: You are adding to them today.

Senator Perrault: The facts should be made known.

Federal expenditures and transfers relating to education have risen from $3.8 billion in 1977-78 to a budgeted $5.697.3 billion in 1981-82.

Honourable senators, on October 29, 1981, the Secretary of State of Canada wrote a letter to the students of Canada, the contents of which I should like to read to honourable senators at this time. The letter states:

The Government of Canada is wholly committed to the support of a strong post-secondary education system responsive to the needs of Canada. I welcome the opportunity today to meet with the student representatives to discuss their concern for the future of higher education.

The Federal Government bears a major and increasing share of the costs of post-secondary education. This year, by our estimates, the Government of Canada is paying more than 55% of the operating costs of post-secondary education. I also recognize that students make a significant contribution. We are concerned that the Provincial Governments have not been doing their part as, on average, the Provincial share of the cost has been declining. We are even more concerned to see that the problems associated with meeting Canada's post-secondary education needs are addressed.

We know the value to the nation of a population equipped with a solid, general education so it can appreciate and, hence, develop a cohesive Canadian society. We want post-secondary education to contribute to the social, scientific, and intellectual fabric of our culture.

That is why we are concerned that there is no satisfactory accounting to Parliament for how the entire Federal contribution to post-secondary education is spent. That is why we are anxious to develop adequate communication with the Provinces, whose jurisdiction over education must continue to be respected, where we can discuss the role of education in meeting national needs, and so that we can be assured that the money we forward to the Provinces is actually spent on post-secondary education. That is also why we are examining the field of student aid because full access to post-secondary education is a top priority of the Federal Government.

Some may say that the Federal Government plans to drastically reduce its support for post-secondary education. This is simply not true.

Of course, the budget confirmed what Mr. Regan said.

The letter goes on to state:

We remain committed to vigorous support for post-secondary education throughout Canada. It is true that difficult decisions must be resolved in a Budget that must address the management of the economy and recognize the problems of the ill, the elderly, and the poor, as well as the importance of post-secondary education. Nevertheless, we consider it paramount to maintain and enhance a post-secondary education system which will give all qualified individuals access to enrichment through study, opportunity to acquire necessary skills and professions, a chance to contribute to our cultural heritage, and the means to improve our knowledge of the world.

May I personally assure you that my commitment as Secretary of State is to help improve our post-secondary education system.

Honourable senators, may I suggest that that message to the students of Canada is substantially more factual than the very expensive advertising campaign sponsored by the Conservative Party in campus newspapers from coast to coast which caused so much alarm and, I suggest, as a result, misled the student body and some of the educators of this country.

Honourable senators, I hope that this debate will serve to record, once and for all, the government's great commitment to support for post-secondary education; that the party which initiated the concept of substantial federal involvement in post-secondary education, and which has continued that commitment, can be counted on to continue it in the future to the fullest possible extent.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: Noting that the minister has furnished us with figures for some years, beginning in 1974 in the case of Prince Edward Island, and noting also that he thinks that funding by the federal government has been ample and generous, would he not then agree with the contention I made an hour ago, that the formula should, in fact, not be altered but retained?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, during that brief and rather hectic period when the Conservative Party had the responsibility of governing this nation, one of the announcements made by the then Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, was that he wanted to sit down with the provinces to discuss and review cost-sharing programs to determine how these programs could be made more effective and to make sure that they were equitable. This is precisely the process in which the present government is involved as far as post-secondary education is concerned.

I would suggest that any responsible government has to look at the funding of post-secondary education when we have gone from a high of 35 per cent provincial support in 1977 down to today's average of about 29 per cent, and far lower in certain provinces. During that time, the federal share has gone from 47 per cent to 56 per cent. It would be irresponsible of the government not to undertake a review of educational funding in this country, which is primarily a provincial responsibility under the B.N.A. Act. Yes, and irresponsible not to re-examine other forms of cost-sharing such as medical and hospital costs. This policy is fully consistent with the statements made by the Conservative Party when they had the responsibility of government. I do not know why Senator Macquarrie should be saying, in effect, "Let us maintain the status quo." Well, the status quo belongs only to those people who lack the vision to plan for the future. The role of the federal government in relation to the funding of post-secondary education should not be exempted from that review process.

● (1530)

I have spoken about the percentage of federal support which varies from province to province. I think the high must be the 110 per cent in Prince Edward Island. I note here from my documents that even in Ontario universities and colleges receive upwards of 60 per cent of their operating costs from the federal government. The provincial share is 22 per cent. Tuition fees and private donations are 18 per cent in the province of Ontario. Only 22 per cent was paid through the treasurer of the Province of Ontario. Yet, expressions of concern were uttered this afternoon by Senator Macquarrie—"those poor provincial treasurers." There is 22 per cent provincial support for higher education in Ontario; 60 per cent is federal.

Senator Macquarrie: In the minister's answer to my question which invoked the prime ministership of Mr. Clark and his early intention to meet with the premiers to discuss these matters, the implication was that the MacEachen alteration in the formula came as a suggestion from the premiers. I hope the minister would not want that responsibility to be laid at the door of the provincial people. They did not request it.

Senator Perrault: The only way this country can operate successfully is by co-operative meetings involving provincial and federal governments.

Senator Roblin: Oh, you've learned that lesson.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the meetings held in the Atlantic provinces recently involving the Minister of Finance were relatively amicable and constructive.

Let me share with you one of the problems with the present program of support for education. The established programs financing proposal, as the Honourable Senator Macquarrie is aware, was put forward at a federal-provincial conference in June 1976. It was accepted and put into effect the following year. Under the new plan, which is the current arrangement, federal contributions are separated from specific provincial expenditures and become unconditional transfers to the provinces. These block transfers include federal contributions to medicare, hospital insurance and diagnostic services as well as to post-secondary education.

The arrangement was made so that provincial governments would be free to administer educational programs to meet the unique needs of their own provinces. Perhaps the greatest difficulty with the current arrangement is the fact that provincial governments are not required to account in any way for the funds provided to them by the federal government for post-secondary education. That is true in other areas as well. I wonder if honourable senators are not prepared to agree that there should be some accountability. If there is not, some believe the purpose of many programs could be defeated. Yet, it is not necessary for the provinces to give any accounting at all as to the way in which funds are allocated.

As I said, the net result has been a drop in the provincial share for education and a significant rise in the federal share. I hope that Senator Macquarrie is not suggesting there is any malicious intent on the part of the federal government when it asks some very pointed questions about what is being done with federal contributions to various programs.

On motion of Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the bells are still ringing in the other place. Obviously, they have not started the vote they were to have started at 3 o'clock, according to their house order. Honourable senators will remember that we all considered it desirable to have the notice of the motion for an Address given today, so that each senator will have a copy in his or her office this evening, plus a copy on his or her desk in the chamber tomorrow in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

I have discussed this with the Leader of the Opposition, and I suggest that what we should do now is give the other place perhaps another hour to get their act together, as the saying goes, and that we should adjourn now to resume at the call of the bell. Frankly, honourable senators, if it turns out that they still have not dealt with the matter by 5 o'clock, it seems to me that we would be pushing it beyond what we need to. It is really for our convenience that we want to have this material published in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for our debate which commences tomorrow. If it seems we are not going to be able to get the finally adopted form in a reasonable time this afternoon, we will ring the bell and simply adjourn. Otherwise, what we will do is give notice of the motion, and then adjourn until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are we to understand that the vote in the other place has proceeded to the stage of disposing of all the amendments, and that they are now voting on the main motion as amended?

Senator Frith: No. My understanding is that they have not started voting, and they have four votes to deal with. Each should take approximately ten minutes, and then they will vote on the main motion. If the voting begins within the next five minutes, they will finish comfortably by 5 o'clock.

Honourable senators, I ask that the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault stand until later this day, at which time we may very well introduce the new resolution and ask leave to withdraw the present one, being confident at that time that we are presenting to the Senate the motion in the exact form in which it received approval in the other place. Therefore, for the moment, may the motion in the name of Senator Perrault stand until later this day?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, to make sure I understand the situation completely, is it the intention of the government leader to speak to this motion after 2 o'clock tomorrow?

Senator Frith: That is correct.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.50 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

THE CONSTITUTION

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): As honourable senators are aware, the votes have now been taken in the other chamber. Therefore, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, December 3, 1981, I shall move the following motion:

THAT, WHEREAS in the past certain amendments to the Constitution of Canada have been made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom at the request and with the consent of Canada—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Leader of the Government seeking concurrence in the resolution that was adopted in the other place? Does it embody the amendments that were adopted?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not a matter of concurrence. This is now the form that was adopted in the other place.

Senator Flynn: It is the form that was adopted in the other place, and it now replaces what we had on our order paper?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is not concurrence. It is, however, an identical Address.

I ask that the motion of which I gave notice on November 19, and which appears on the order paper, be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will notice that we have distributed copies of the Motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada. It is in the form that has just been adopted in the other place and will appear in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate to be placed on our desks tomorrow. Honourable senators will then have a copy to study this evening, and a further copy in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

Pursuant to the order that was adopted yesterday, we shall commence debate on the motion at 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. We may wish to defer Question Period, or we may commence the debate immediately following Question Period. The debate itself need not commence at 2 p.m., but it will commence during the sitting which begins at 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: You mean that it will be the first order of the day?

Senator Frith: Yes; we should make it clear that it will be the first order of the day.

THE HONOURABLE ALLISTER GROSART, P.C.

UNVEILING OF PORTRAIT OF FORMER SPEAKER

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I should like to inform honourable senators that the unveiling of Senator Grosart's portrait will take place immediately following the adjournment of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 3, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE SENATE

CBS BROADCAST—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. Yesterday evening at 6.30 I tuned my television set to the channel relaying the news program of the Columbia Broadcasting System. To my astonishment, a Union Jack was flashed on the screen, and then the news reader said that the Constitution had now passed the House of Commons in Canada and was going to the powerless Senate.

I feel that perhaps someone should explain to those who write for that broadcasting system that the Senate is not yet powerless, although at some time soon we may be. Perhaps also the Canadian Embassy should mention this matter since I feel it is insulting that the Senate should be regarded as powerless, and that the Union Jack should symbolize our country.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Bird has raised an interesting point. I do not think we should simply acknowledge receipt of the information. I would be glad if the Leader of the Government would tell us that it is not the intention of the government to push this matter through the Senate without a decent, orderly and lengthy debate. I have read of other occurrences that impinged upon the privileges of the Senate. I have been told that one member of the administration has said that the Senate could not do anything to the resolution, that it was a mere procedural matter. I would like the Leader of the Government to comment on the point raised by Senator Bird.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in reply to the Leader of the Opposition, we have stated both privately and publicly that an opportunity will, of course, be accorded to all honourable senators who wish to participate in this historic debate. I repeat that, and I hope it is understood by the official opposition.

Senator Flynn: We will see.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

DELEGATION OF POLISH PARLIAMENTARIANS HEADED BY MR.
STANISLAW GUCWA

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the presence in the gallery of a Polish delegation headed by the Speaker "Marshal" Mr. Stanislaw Gucwa.

[Translation]

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, may I add to our Speaker's welcome a few words in Polish?

Niech żyje Polska. Niech żyja, posłowie Sejmu polskiego. Niech żyje przyjazn polsko—kanadyjska.

Long Live Poland! Long live members of the Polish Parliament! Long live the friendship between Canada and Poland!

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Board of Trustees of the Queen Elizabeth II Canadian Fund to Aid in Research on the Diseases of Children, including the Auditor General's Report on the financial statements of the Board, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 15 of the Queen Elizabeth II Canadian Research Fund Act, Chapter Q-1, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Minister of Supply and Services relating to gold coins for the period ended June 30, 1981, pursuant to section 4.1 of the Currency and Exchange Act, as amended by Chapter 35, Statutes of Canada, 1977-78.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), I move:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Hastings be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Cottreau on the list of senators serving on the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—
GOVERNMENT'S POSITION RESPECTING AMENDMENTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have been told that after yesterday's vote in the House of Commons, the Minister of Justice stated that no amendments from the Senate would be supported and that the Senate was only given the choice of adopting or rejecting the constitutional resolution as it stood.

I should like to know whether it is really the government's position, that we have been asked merely to ratify the decision made yesterday in the other place.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition has been a member of this assembly for a considerable period of time. He is well aware that, if an honourable senator moves an amendment and his motion is seconded in the chamber, and the motion is supported by a majority, then that amendment goes forward.

I hardly think I should reply to a question based upon a statement purportedly made by the Minister of Justice and perhaps quoted out of context.

Senator Flynn: I did not mention the Minister of Justice. I am glad the Leader of the Government has identified him.

Senator Perrault: You did mention him.

Senator Flynn: No, I did not.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Yes, you did.

Senator Flynn: I simply said "a minister." But even if I did mention the Minister of Justice, you have confirmed it. At any rate, what I really want to know is whether the government's position is that it will resist any amendment moved in this place, regardless of its origin in the house.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the debate will begin this afternoon. The persuasive oratory of the Leader of the Opposition may bring about all sorts of wondrous things.

Senator Flynn: It will certainly be the first time.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—DATE OF TERMINATION OF DEBATE

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. At this stage of the proceedings is he in a position to give us information on a possible termination date? Those of us who are commuters face problems of transportation arrangements and other attendant difficulties. Personally, I express the hope that the termination of the debate will not be until next week, but perhaps the leader can give us further information on that now.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can report that on a most amicable and co-operative basis we have had a number of discussions with the Leader of the Opposition and it has been agreed that the debate shall commence this afternoon and that perhaps at some point in the debate, either today or tomorrow, we may discuss the possibility of a fixed date for both the termination of the debate itself and for the vote.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MANITOBA—WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND ALLOCATIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I again direct the attention of the honourable minister in charge of economic development to the Western Development Fund—or should it more properly be called the "vanishing fund"?

The minister suggested that I look in more detail at page 20 of the budget. I have already done that on a number of occasions. I want him to tell me if my arithmetic is correct. According to my understanding, the expenditure from this fund in 1981-82 will be $148 million instead of the $350 million previously forecast.

As I understand the breakdown of that $148 million: $81 million or $82 million will be expended in respect of farm compensation; $6 million or $7 million is to pay for certain tax incentives available to the railways—if "incentives" is still a proper word to use in this legislature; and the remaining $60 million is slated for rapid transit in Vancouver. Perhaps the minister could enlighten me as to whether that breakdown is indeed correct.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I think it is correct.

Senator Roblin: Does that mean to say, then, that there are no other plans to use any moneys from this fund for economic development or as seed money in western Canada in the coming fiscal year?

Senator Olson: No, it does not mean that at all, honourable senators, because, if you read the rest of the second paragraph on page 20, you will find very clearly what the allocation in the budget from the Western Development Fund will be not only for 1982-83 but for the following years. For 1982-83 there is an amount of $182 million. The amount allocated for 1983-84 is $375 million, and further amounts of $415 million and $400 million have been allocated for 1984-85 and 1985-86 respectively.

● (1410)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am sure that my honourable friend is well aware that he has not answered my question. I did not ask him what allocations appeared in this paper for coming fiscal years, and which are probably subject to the same degree of change as we have experienced so far for the current fiscal year. What I asked him was whether there was any money in this fund that remains to be allocated for the fiscal year in question, not subsequent fiscal years, as he mentioned.

Senator Olson: I presume that the fiscal year in question is 1981-82?

Senator Roblin: Yes, that is one of them.

Senator Olson: As I explained once or twice many months ago, and as the Minister of Finance and other members of the government have explained, to honourable senators and others who asked questions, the $350 million allocated in the 1980 budget was dependent to some degree, and I suggest to a significant degree, on the governments of the producing provinces and the Government of Canada coming to an agreement on energy pricing, which plays such a large role in the revenues involved. Indeed, there was delay from the time of the 1980 budget until September 1, 1981. At that time an agreement was reached, which improved our ability to predict these revenues. Before that time and since there have been some allocations—for example, the amount of $148 million. I do not believe there will be further allocations for the fiscal year 1981-82.

Senator Roblin: Does the minister not know that in 1982-83 the amount available in this fund has been reduced from $700 million to $182 million, to which I would add the $75 million appropriated for Indian benefits and social programs of that kind in the west. However, in terms of seed money and economic development, the allocation has been reduced to $182 million, which is a considerable reduction from $700 million. Actually, the government is deferring nearly $500 million in the coming fiscal year in respect to the Western Development Fund. How does that relate to the unpredictability of revenue estimates and the oil and gas situation, which my honourable friend has used as an excuse for his actions so far?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have used no excuses at all. I have stated very clearly that the allocations which were projected in the 1980 budget did not materialize for several months afterwards. Whether or not my honourable friend wants to accept that situation as a fact is his choice. Nevertheless, it is the position this government has taken. The amount of $182 million has been allocated in this recent budget for the 1982-83 fiscal year for economic development purposes, and an additional amount has been allocated for economic development through native programs, which were assigned to the social development envelope. When the honourable senator adds those figures together, the amount is $1,895 million in the years for which funds have been allocated. What is more, we have indicated that there may be further allocations in another budget down the road, perhaps in 1982-83 or beyond.

My honourable friend must accept, whether he wants to or not, that $1,895 million has been provided and allocated already, and more funds may be allocated in future budgets. To date, those are the two highest priorities that have been identified, and funds have been allocated to those priorities.

[Senator Roblin.]

● (1415)

Senator Roblin: What I am trying to get my honourable friend to explain to me is the reason for the deductions. Accepting the figures he gave us, and I do, as $182 million for the 1982-83 fiscal year plus $75 million for social and Indian affairs in the same year, that does not compare with the $700 million that was previously forecast. He gave as his reason for that the fact that he could not properly estimate the oil revenues. How can that apply to a fiscal year that does not start until next March when all these figures are in place?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could read from the budget papers and the budget speech to reiterate to my honourable friend, if he has not already read them—but I know that he has—that the Minister of Finance not only indicated but also stated very firmly that the amount of money allocated out of the Western Development Fund had been re-profiled. There is no question about that.

Senator Roblin: You mean reduced.

Senator Olson: We are not denying it. The question is how many more times does he want me to say it? That is the question. Whether or not he comes up with these amounts, he should go back and read what the minister said.

Senator Roblin: I am going to accept the fact that when the minister says “re-profiled” he really means reduced—and cut in half at that.

Senator Olson: Well, that is not true, but if the honourable senator wants to come to that conclusion, I guess that is a product of his distorted thinking.

Senator Roblin: It is a product of my correct mathematics.

THE ECONOMY

CHARTERED BANKS—PROFITS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is also to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It deals with a statement made by the General Manager of the Royal Bank of Canada, as reported in the Globe and Mail on December 2, that he is “very happy” with the profits they are making.

Following are some statistics I read in that article:

Share profit at $5.92 up 33 per cent, compared with asset growth of 31 per cent. Year-end assets were $87.5-billion, up to 39 per cent.

For the full year ended October 31, the balance of revenue after tax was $492.5-million—

Would the minister know if the Minister of Finance is now going to make the banks bleed a little to help people who are going bankrupt, people who are losing their homes because they cannot keep up their mortgages, and the deteriorating state of the economy as far as people are concerned?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance has stated repeatedly that he expected the banks in this country to make a contribution, to play their role and to make provision for some of the problems that my honourable friend has just identified. If he is asking me to ask the Minister of Finance to state it again, I can do that, but if he prefers, I can bring copies of the statements that he has already made on this subject in the past.

Senator Marshall: Would the minister ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether an investigation could be made as to the rate of profit? There are so many bankruptcies and the banks are, on the one hand, saying they are "very happy" with their profits, and, on the other hand, they are saying that the economy will get worse. It certainly is not getting worse for them. Somebody should have responsibility for the people of Canada of seeing what in the name of God is going on in this country. Hundreds of thousands of people are having their morale and livelihood destroyed because of the actions of the Government of Canada and the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Would the minister tell us if he will look into this matter?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall convey that to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

EFFICACY OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. As we are all aware, Statistics Canada has reported that the economy declined in the last quarter, and the forecasts for the present quarter are not that promising either. In fact, they appear to be very grim. Can the minister tell us whether the government's economic development policies are working?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, when the statement regarding economic policy was made by the Minister of Finance, he indicated that it would take some time to reduce inflation by means of a number of actions, including a reduction in the government's financial requirements through a reduction in the deficit. That, obviously, will take some time. He indicated that he did not expect it to happen overnight.

I suggest to my honourable friend that he read the Statistics Canada report that was made available on December 2, and he will find that some of the representations that he made previously, based on some other people's interpretation of that report, are not valid.

● (1420)

Senator Doody: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. The honourable the minister indicates that it is going to take some time for the budget provisions to have an effect on the economy. Is the minister telling us that there was no economic strategy or development policy prior to the tabling of the budget?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I did not say that at all. Here again, if my honourable friend would like a 30-minute speech on the important aspects of the main thrusts of the budget, I would be glad to provide one; but that, of course, is an improper action to take during Question Period.

Senator Doody: Another supplementary, honourable senators. If the honourable the minister is suggesting that he is going to give us the latest updated version of the budget in 30 minutes, I think all of Canada would be glad to give him that amount of time. I was really referring, however, to the original document that was tabled in the House of Commons some time ago, and not the daily revisions that are now coming forth.

In any event, the honourable the minister spoke of some good portents that had been indicated by Statistics Canada. I know that net exports fell sharply during the quarter, that consumer expenditures on durable goods fell, and that construction is just about at a standstill. The only thing that appears to be going along well, at an increased pace, is government spending. I wonder if the minister is clinging to government spending as a cure for the ills of the economy during the coming months.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, perhaps I should read some parts of the Statistics Canada report to indicate the complete distortion contained in what my honourable friend has just said. I quote directly:

Preliminary estimates indicate that Gross National Product, seasonally adjusted at annual rates, rose to $331 billion in the third quarter, a current dollar increase of 1.6 per cent from its level of the second quarter. In real terms, however, GNP declined 1.0 per cent, after registering strong growth in the previous three quarters, as the economy appears to have given way in the face of a protracted period of high interest rates.

The honourable senator has to accept, I think, that there was higher than predicted growth in the three quarters previous to the quarter of July, August and September. These advances were significantly higher than anyone was predicting and, as I explained to him a few days ago, the Minister of Finance had predicted a decline from those rather strong growth factors in the economy. Now, of course, what he predicted is happening.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY— FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government to get some information, without going into details or providing any justification, from the Minister of Transport concerning the bilateral negotiations between the federal government and the Province of Newfoundland with regard to the Trans-Canada Highway and improvements to it. Perhaps the honourable leader could give some kind of statement in this chamber within the next few days as to the progress of those negotiations, and as to what can be expected from them in the near future.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice, but is it not a paradox that the previous questioner from the opposition ranks demanded a reduction of government spending, while now Senator Marshall asks for highway construction aid for his province? I suggest that the members of the opposition might discuss what position they are going to take with respect to government spending.

● (1425)

Hon. C. William Doody: I rise on a point of order, honourable senators. I did not demand a reduction in government spending. I pointed out that one of the increases in the indicators was government spending. If the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate wishes to put some money into some sort of transportation system in Newfoundland, I can forgive the government many of its excesses in other areas.

Senator Perrault: I thank the honourable senator for his approval of federal government spending policies.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, perhaps we could collect a bill which has been owed the highways department in Newfoundland since 1949.

THE BUDGET

MODIFICATION OF PROVISIONS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On November 19 he undertook to send forward an inquiry regarding inequities that arose as a result of the budget speech and its effect upon people living in various regions of the country. For example, people living in the more westerly regions of the country were in a position to take corrective measures resulting from provisions of the budget, yet those living in the more easterly regions could not. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he has any information in this regard.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question was taken as notice at that time, but no answer has yet been received.

AIR CANADA

INAPPROPRIATE REPLY TO REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: If honourable senators will permit me, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. By way of background, I have a copy of a letter written to Air Canada by a student in North Battleford, Saskatchewan. If honourable senators will allow me, I shall read the letter she wrote to Air Canada.

I am a grade 11 student at North Battleford Comprehensive High School. I am interested in choosing a career as an airline stewardess. I enjoy travel and meeting the public. Could you please send me any pamphlets or brochures which you may have? Are there any special requirements or school subjects which I may need? Thank you.

She then gave her name and address.

The reply from Air Canada reads as follows:

Dear Applicant:

This is in reference to your inquiry and/or application for the position of flight attendant with Air Canada. Because of the great number of applications received from within Canada, we are unable to receive at this time applications from outside the country.

Should you in the future take up residence in Canada, and if you possess Canadian citizenship or landed immigrant status, you may contact the above address for an application form and further employment information.

We wish to thank you for your interest in our airlines.

For your further information, honourable senators, the actual address of this student is 1761 Trudeau Street, North Battleford, Saskatchewan.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to draw to the attention of Air Canada the fact that Saskatchewan is indeed a part of Canada. Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate try to obtain the assurance from Air Canada that citizens living in Saskatchewan will be dealt with as Canadians? Will the Leader of the Government request Air Canada to send the proper information to the applicant involved? Will the leader report back as to the action which has been taken regarding this matter?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that exchange of correspondence does not, apparently, meet Air Canada's usual high standards of service and efficiency.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL—VOLUME OF SHIPMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I see that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board is present in the chamber. I have a question for him.

He was kind enough the other day to provide me with some information about the surveys that have been made with respect to the feasibility of using the Port of Churchill. Did he have a chance to read that information before he rendered it to me?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): No, I did not.

Senator Roblin: I must inform him that the return comprises documents that have only to do with the movement of wheat. As the honourable senator appreciates, that is not what I was requesting. I want to know whether any studies have been made of the movement of potash or, for that matter, general cargo through this port. I ask the honourable minister if he would re-examine this situation to see if he can give me more information. Meanwhile, I ask the Clerk to return this set of information to the minister because I am afraid that I have no use for it, and it may be useful material for his records.

Senator Argue: I thought that the request of the honourable senator would include studies which have been done with regard to wheat, but it seems that it does not. I will be happy to look into the matter further. If there are other studies that I can obtain, I will bring them to the attention of the honourable senator.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question which I address to the same minister. It was requested in this chamber that he pass on to us any of the information he may have received from the ministers of the various western provinces with regard to their co-operation in bringing goods other than wheat through the Port of Churchill. I wonder whether the minister is prepared to respond to that request. Has he received any further information pertaining to such other goods that may pass through the Port of Churchill?

Senator Argue: The request, as I informed the honourable senator, went forward to the various ministers in the three western provinces. I shall look at my records to ascertain whether any reply has been received to date. If there are such replies, and they are of substance, I will be pleased to pass that information on to Senator Guay.

● (1430)

Senator Guay: Perhaps we should also know whether any of the premiers have responded to the minister.

Senator Argue: Just by way of clarification, the letter did not go to the premiers but, as appropriate, it went to either the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Agriculture of each province. However, the same answer applies.

INDIAN ACT

STATUS OF WOMEN—REMOVAL OF DISCRIMINATORY PROVISIONS

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Smith asked whether the government had decided to delay for a year the removal from the Indian Act of discriminatory provisions against women. I would advise that I have made inquiries and the answer is no.

An erroneous press report appeared indicating that a one-year deferral would apply, but, in conversation with the Honourable Judy Erola, the minister responsible for the status of women, I have been assured that that report was erroneous and that legislation will be proceeded with as soon as possible.

As I said yesterday, the costs of removing discriminatory provisions from the Indian Act are under study by the government and the nature of the issues is as I mentioned yesterday.

My remarks will also respond to a question asked on October 29 by Senator Bielish concerning the same subject.

THE SENATE

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS—PRINTING OF WRITTEN QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I refer to Senator Godfrey's question directed to me as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration during yesterday's sitting. I apologize for my temporary absence at the time the question was put, and in answer to the preamble to the question put by the honourable senator, I agree that this matter has been the subject of discussion between him and me on numerous occasions.

It is true that certain recommendations were approved by the committee at a meeting on May 28, 1981, from which I was unavoidably absent. At the subsequent meeting on July 9, I felt, as chairman, that I had a responsibility to point out to the members of the committee that decisions had been taken without the benefit of a cost analysis. On that day, members of the committee agreed that the report approved on May 28 be tabled—not rescinded, but tabled—for consideration at a future meeting, and that a further study be conducted taking into account costs which might be saved in this area.

The July 9 meeting was the last committee meeting before the summer adjournment and the resumption of proceedings in both houses on October 14.

Yesterday Senator Godfrey asked specifically, "Why cannot we go ahead with the first two recommendations?" As chairman, I interpreted the feelings of the committee to be that all the recommendations should be dealt with en bloc when reported to the Senate.

With respect to Senator Godfrey's second question—"Why does it take six months to get cost estimates?"—I can only remind him again that Parliament was in recess until October 14 and, because of that situation, I, personally, did not pressure the administration for this information until Parliament resumed. For that I take full responsibility.

In any event, the requested information was first made available to members of the committee at last week's meeting on Thursday, November 26. At that time the matter was considered and members of the committee agreed that they would prefer to have an opportunity to study the cost analysis and deal with the entire matter at the next meeting.

I had hoped to have that meeting this morning but, in view of the heavy schedule of committee meetings with resulting overlapping conflicts, it was suggested that our next meeting be postponed until Thursday, December 10, 1981, one week from today. On that day I hope that a final decision will be made and a full report submitted forthwith to this chamber.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), seconded by Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of December 2, 1981, moved:

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), seconded by Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of December 2, 1981, moved:

THAT, WHEREAS in the past certain amendments to the Constitution of Canada have been made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom at the request and with the consent of Canada;

AND WHEREAS it is in accord with the status of Canada as an independent state that Canadians be able to amend their Constitution in Canada in all respects;

AND WHEREAS it is also desirable to provide in the Constitution of Canada for the recognition of certain fundamental rights and freedoms and to make other amendments to that Constitution;

A respectful address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

15

CONSIDÉRANT :

que le Parlement du Royaume-Uni a modifié à plusieurs reprises la Constitution du Canada à la demande et avec le consentement de celui-ci;

que, de par le statut d'État indépendant du Canada, il est légitime que les Canadiens aient tout pouvoir pour modifier leur Constitution au Canada;

qu'il est souhaitable d'inscrire dans la Constitution du Canada la reconnaissance de certains droits et libertés fondamentaux et d'y apporter d'autres modifications, il est proposé que soit présentée respectueusement à Sa Majesté la Reine l'adresse dont la teneur suit :

15

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

A Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine,
Très Gracieuse Souveraine :

We, Your Majesty's loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, respectfully approach Your Majesty, requesting that you may graciously be pleased to cause to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom a measure containing the recitals and clauses hereinafter set forth:

25

Nous, membres du Sénat du Canada réunis en Parlement, fidèles sujets de Votre Majesté, demandons respectueusement à Votre Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi ainsi conçu :

ANNEXE A—SCHEDULE A

An Act to give effect to a request by the Senate and House of Commons of Canada

Loi donnant suite à une demande du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes du Canada

Whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to give effect to the provisions hereinafter set forth and the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty requesting that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a Bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose.

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. The Constitution Act, 1981 set out in Schedule B to this Act is hereby enacted for and shall have the force of law in Canada and shall come into force as provided in that Act.

2. No Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the Constitution Act, 1981 comes into force shall extend to Canada as part of its law.

3. So far as it is not contained in Schedule B, the French version of this Act is set out in Schedule A to this Act and has the same authority in Canada as the English version thereof.

4. This Act may be cited as the Canada Act.

Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine, considérant :

qu'à la demande et avec le consentement du Canada, le Parlement du Royaume-Uni est invité à adopter une loi visant à donner effet aux dispositions énoncées ci-après et que le Sénat et la Chambre des communes du Canada réunis en Parlement ont présenté une adresse demandant à Sa Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi à cette fin, sur l'avis et du consentement des Lords spirituels et temporels et des Communes réunis en Parlement, et par l'autorité de celui-ci, édicte :

1. La Loi constitutionnelle de 1981, énoncée à l'annexe B, est édictée pour le Canada et y a force de loi. Elle entre en vigueur conformément à ses dispositions.

2. Les lois adoptées par le Parlement du Royaume-Uni après l'entrée en vigueur de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1981 ne font pas partie du droit du Canada.

3. La partie de la version française de la présente loi qui figure à l'annexe A a force de loi au Canada au même titre que la version anglaise correspondante.

4. Titre abrégé de la présente loi : Loi sur le Canada.

Restriction on proclamation

39. (1) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) before the expiration of one year from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder, unless the legislative assembly of each province has previously adopted a resolution of assent or dissent.

39. (1) La proclamation visée au paragraphe 38(1) ne peut être prise dans l'année suivant l'adoption de la résolution à l'origine de la procédure de modification que si l'assemblée législative de chaque province a préalablement adopté une résolution d'agrément ou de désaccord.

Restriction

Idem

(2) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) after the expiration of three years from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder.

(2) La proclamation visée au paragraphe 38(1) ne peut être prise que dans les trois ans suivant l'adoption de la résolution à l'origine de la procédure de modification.

46. (1) The procedures for amendment under sections 38, 41, 42 and 43 may be initiated either by the Senate or the House of Commons or by the legislative assembly of a province.

46. (1) L'initiative des procédures de modification visées aux articles 38, 41, 42 et 43 appartient au Sénat, à la Chambre des communes ou à une assemblée législative.

Revocation of authorization

(2) A resolution of assent made for the purposes of this Part may be revoked at any time before the issue of a proclamation authorized by it.

(2) Une résolution d'agrément adoptée dans le cadre de la présente partie peut être révoquée à tout moment avant la date de la proclamation qu'elle autorise.

Amendments without Senate
resolution

47. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

47. (1) Dans les cas visés à l'article 38, 41, 42 ou 43, il peut être passé outre au défaut d'autorisation du Sénat si celui-ci n'a pas adopté de résolution dans un délai de cent quatre-vingts jours suivant l'adoption de celle de la Chambre des communes et si cette dernière, après l'expiration du délai, adopte une nouvelle résolution dans le même sens.

PART VI

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

50. The Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly named the British North America Act, 1867) is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 92 thereof, the following heading and section:

“Non-Renewable Natural Resources, Forestry Resources and Electrical Energy

92A. (1) In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to

- (a) exploration for non-renewable natural resources in the province;
- (b) development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom; and
- (c) development, conservation and management of sites and facilities in the province for the generation and production of electrical energy.

(2) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the export from the province to another part of Canada of the primary production from non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the production from facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy, but such laws may not authorize or provide for discrimination in prices or in supplies exported to another part of Canada.

PARTIE VI

MODIFICATION DE LA LOI CONSTITUTIONNELLE DE 1867

50. La Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 (antérieurement désignée sous le titre : Acte de l'Amérique du Nord britannique, 1867) est modifiée par insertion, après l'article 92, de la rubrique et de l'article suivants :

Modification de la *Loi constitution-
nelle de 1867*

«Ressources naturelles non renouvelables, ressources forestières et énergie électrique

92A. (1) La législature de chaque province a compétence exclusive pour légiférer dans les domaines suivants :

Compétence
provinciale

- a) prospection des ressources naturelles non renouvelables de la province;
- b) exploitation, conservation et gestion des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, y compris leur rythme de production primaire;
- c) aménagement, conservation et gestion des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique.

(2) La législature de chaque province a compétence pour légiférer en ce qui concerne l'exportation, hors de la province, à destination d'une autre partie du Canada, de la production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, ainsi que de la production d'énergie électrique de la province, sous réserve de ne pas adopter de lois autorisant ou prévoyant des disparités de prix ou des disparités dans les exportations destinées à une autre partie du Canada.

Exportation hors des provinces

Authority of Parliament

(3) Nothing in subsection (2) derogates from the authority of Parliament to enact laws in relation to the matters referred to in that subsection and, where such a law of Parliament and a law of a province conflict, the law of Parliament prevails to the extent of the conflict. 5

Taxation of resources

(4) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation 10 in respect of

(a) non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the primary production therefrom, and 15

(b) sites and facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy and the production therefrom, whether or not such production is exported in whole or in part from the province, but 20 such laws may not authorize or provide for taxation that differentiates between production exported to another part of Canada and production not exported from the province. 25

"Primary production"

(5) The expression "primary production" has the meaning assigned by the Sixth Schedule.

Existing powers
or rights

(6) Nothing in subsections (1) to (5) derogates from any powers or rights that a 30 legislature or government of a province had immediately before the coming into force of this section."

Idem

51. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following Schedule:

"THE SIXTH SCHEDULE

Primary Production from Non-Renewable Natural Resources and Forestry Resources

1. For the purposes of section 92A of this Act,

(3) Le paragraphe (2) ne porte pas atteinte au pouvoir du Parlement de légiférer dans les domaines visés à ce paragraphe, les dispositions d'une loi du Parlement adoptée dans ces domaines l'emportant sur 5 les dispositions incompatibles d'une loi provinciale.

Pouvoir du Parlement

(4) La législature de chaque province a compétence pour prélever des sommes d'argent par tout mode ou système de 10 taxation :

a) des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, ainsi que de la production primaire qui en est tirée; 15

b) des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique, ainsi que de cette production même.

Cette compétence peut s'exercer indépendamment du fait que la production en cause soit ou non, en totalité ou en partie, exportée hors de la province, mais les lois adoptées dans ces domaines ne peuvent autoriser ou prévoir une taxation qui éta- 20 blisse une distinction entre la production exportée à destination d'une autre partie du Canada et la production non exportée hors de la province. 25

(5) L'expression «production primaire» a 30 le sens qui lui est donné dans la sixième annexe.

«Production
primaire»

(6) Les paragraphes (1) à (5) ne portent pas atteinte aux pouvoirs ou droits détenus par la législature ou le gouvernement 35 d'une province lors de l'entrée en vigueur du présent article.»

Pouvoirs ou
droits existants

51. Ladite loi est en outre modifiée par 35 adjonction de l'annexe suivante :

Idem

«SIXIÈME ANNEXE

Production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières

1. Pour l'application de l'article 92A : 40

(a) production from a non-renewable natural resource is primary production therefrom if

(i) it is in the form in which it exists upon its recovery or severance from its natural state, or 5

(ii) it is a product resulting from processing or refining the resource, and is not a manufactured product or a product resulting from refining crude oil, 10 refining upgraded heavy crude oil, refining gases or liquids derived from coal or refining a synthetic equivalent of crude oil; and

(b) production from a forestry resource is 15 primary production therefrom if it consists of sawlogs, poles, lumber, wood chips, sawdust or any other primary wood product, or wood pulp, and is not a product manufactured from wood." 20

a) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource naturelle non renouvelable :

(i) soit le produit qui se présente sous la même forme que lors de son extraction 5 du milieu naturel,

(ii) soit le produit non manufacturé de la transformation, du raffinage ou de l'affinage d'une ressource, à l'exception du produit du raffinage du pétrole brut, 10 du raffinage du pétrole brut lourd amélioré, du raffinage des gaz ou des liquides dérivés du charbon ou du raffinage d'un équivalent synthétique du pétrole brut; 15

b) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource forestière la production constituée de billots, de poteaux, de bois d'œuvre, de copeaux, de sciure ou d'autre produit primaire du bois, ou de pâte de 20 bois, à l'exception d'un produit manufacturé en bois.»

PART VII

GENERAL

Primacy of Constitution of Canada

52. (1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect. 25

Constitution of Canada

(2) The Constitution of Canada includes

(a) the Canada Act, including this Act;
(b) the Acts and orders referred to in Schedule I; and

(c) any amendment to any Act or order 30 referred to in paragraph (a) or (b).

Amendments to Constitution of Canada

(3) Amendments to the Constitution of Canada shall be made only in accordance with the authority contained in the Constitution of Canada. 35

Repeals and new names

53. (1) The enactments referred to in Column I of Schedule I are hereby repealed or amended to the extent indicated in Column II thereof and, unless repealed, shall continue as law in Canada under the names 40 set out in Column III thereof.

PARTIE VII

DISPOSITIONS GÉNÉRALES

Primauté de la
Constitution du
Canada

52. (1) La Constitution du Canada est la loi suprême du Canada; elle rend inopérantes les dispositions incompatibles de toute autre 25 règle de droit.

He said: Honourable senators, it is with a feeling of great privilege that I rise in my place to ask you to support the last political action required in Canada to bring about the patriation of our Constitution and the entrenchment of a Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This process will complete the general removal of Canada from British legislative authority, a process that began at the Imperial Conference of 1926, 55 years ago, and was partially completed upon the occasion of the Proclamation of the Statute of Westminster on December 11, 1931, 50 years ago.

It has been a long and often arduous process. There have been periods of great hope. Honourable senators will recall the hope which soared in 1965, and the hope of 1971. Both were subsequently dashed. Finally, in a manner which can only be described as quintessentially Canadian, a consensus involving the federal government and nine provinces—and hopefully, at some point in time, all the provinces—was reached on a resolution. That required a great deal of compromise and accommodation while protecting the fundamental national interests of Canada.

This is not a time for recrimination; not a time to review what might have been; and not a time to review past speeches where words may have been uttered in anger. The time has arrived for us to consider this consensus to determine whether the Address that we send to Westminster shall be in the best possible form at least for the times in which we live in the year 1981, because further changes and amendments may be required and may be proposed in future years. The processes set forth in this constitutional consensus establish an amending formula which will permit constitutional change and change in a number of directions.

● (1440)

This is no mean achievement, and all those who assisted in this process, regardless of party, deserve a measure of the credit. The members of the parties in the other place, who yesterday overwhelmingly supported the resolution, and the provincial premiers who, in the process, had to be conciliatory and co-operative and who demonstrated flexibility—they too deserve a measure of commendation. Also the many officials behind the scene, whose names will never be known—those who serve us so well in Parliament, and those who serve provincial governments in various capacities. All of those who assisted in the process deserve congratulations—not the least of whom is the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Without the Prime Minister's great tenacity, where weaker hearts would have failed; without his dedication to a strong nation and to the national interest;

[Senator Perrault.]

without his dedication to the strengthening of Canada—yes, and without his flexibility—

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh! You were doing all right up to now, but don't start joking.

Senator Perrault: Already I hear the cynical laughter of the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: Certainly, and you are going to hear it again.

Senator Perrault: —who has predicted so many times in the past that the Prime Minister was utterly inflexible, that he would not be moved, that this was an attempt by him to "ram through" a measure contrary to the interest of the nation. How many times have we heard that from the Leader of the Opposition? But even the Leader of the Opposition and his supporters must concede the flexibility shown by the Prime Minister.

Senator Flynn: With regard to Quebec too, I suppose.

Senator Perrault: None of us would be in a position to complete this historic debate had it not been for the position taken by the Prime Minister, in co-operation with many other Canadians from coast to coast.

Senator Flynn: Probably it would have been much better had he not done that.

Senator Perrault: We should also pay tribute to the role played by one of my cabinet colleagues, namely, the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, and also by the members of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons who laboured hard and long last winter—and how they laboured. Let us remind ourselves of the extent of their work. Fifty-one members of this chamber served on the committee at one time or another and made a significant contribution to the final result. There were 323 groups and 639 individuals who made written submissions, for a total of 962. Of the 323 groups, 163 groups submitted briefs, and the submissions of the remaining 160 groups were in the form of telegrams, letters, and so on.

Never in the history of this nation has any one issue been debated at such length and so completely by parliamentarians, and deservedly so. Those members of both houses and officials who spent such long hours in those committee meetings, and listened patiently and earnestly to the submissions made by organizations and individuals, also deserve congratulations.

Honourable senators can be proud of the active role senators played on that committee. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which it is hoped will be entrenched in the Canadian Constitution, has been described by many observers as being the very best in the world. It is not perfection, because it can be improved, and hopefully it will be improved in the future.

But if we are to have this so-called "best Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the world," now, then it is due in part to the work of honourable senators in honing and refining the original proposal.

And, again, honourable senators, I would be remiss if I did not offer congratulations to the provincial premiers, who also demonstrated their determination to patriate the Constitution for Canadians.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, in that number I would include the Premier of the Province of Quebec who, unfortunately, could not bring himself to join with the Prime Minister and the other nine provincial premiers to sign this historic agreement. Personally, and on behalf of the government, I hope that Quebec and the rest of the country will eventually see eye to eye and accept this new agreement which affords improved protection to the French-speaking people of this country.

Senator Flynn: When?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, from the bottom of my heart I wish Quebec would acknowledge that its rights are better protected by this document at this time than at any other time in the history of Canada.

Senator Flynn: Are you kidding? Are you serious?

Senator Perrault: Our cards are on the table. Any sensible person will agree that the Prime Minister was most flexible with Quebec, if we keep in mind his remarks to Quebec November 7 last.

[English]

The resolution before us today will be familiar to all honourable senators. The provisions respecting equalization and resources are the same as those that were before us on April 24. The Charter also provides for the same rights and freedoms that were before us on that date. Due in no small measure to my cabinet colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—and assisted by one of our colleagues, the Honourable Jack Austin, now Minister of State with special responsibilities in connection with Indian Affairs and Northern Development—the provisions respecting the rights of the aboriginal peoples have been restored in the resolution essentially in the same form accepted by this house last spring.

Honourable senators will welcome the fact that the provinces have agreed to remove the non obstante clause from section 28. It is a victory for the women of this country, and the first legal move toward a non-sexist society of the future.

The purpose of section 28 is to place beyond doubt that the rights and freedoms in this Charter are to apply equally to men and women. Thus it will not permit provisions of the Charter to be construed as permitting discriminatory practices against either men or women in this country.

Senator Flynn: So you say.

Senator Perrault: Turning to the Charter of Rights, it should be emphasized that the entire Charter will be entrenched in the Constitution and no province will be able to opt out of any of its provisions. The agreement signed by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the nine premiers does not emasculate the Charter—that word was used by some observers—but democratic rights and fundamental freedoms, mobility rights, legal rights, equality rights, and the use of the two official languages in federal institutions will apply across the country, and they are in the Constitution.

Minority language education rights will also be entrenched across Canada, with the application of those rights within the Province of Quebec slightly modified to accommodate the special circumstances that prevail in that province.

It is true that certain sections of the Charter will be subject to an override clause, and that has caused concern in some quarters. But, as the Minister of Justice has noted, what the premiers and the Prime Minister agreed to could best be described as a safety valve—a safety valve unlikely ever to be used except in non-controversial circumstances by Parliament or the legislatures to override certain sections of the Charter.

● (1450)

The purpose of the override clause is to provide a degree of flexibility, and from the outset the premiers of the provinces and many other people have sought that flexibility to ensure that legislatures rather than judges have the final say on important matters of public policy. The override clause in respect of this Charter of Rights will require a law to state specifically that part or all of it applies notwithstanding a particular section of the Charter, with such an override automatically expiring after five years unless specifically renewed by a legislature.

The first effect of this provision would be to make it politically difficult for a government, without very good reason, to introduce a measure that would apply notwithstanding the Charter of Rights. It would be a brave and foolhardy government, indeed, that would invoke this clause in the face of an obvious human need and in the face of an opposition vigorously pursuing its traditional role.

Senator Flynn: Not always efficiently.

Senator Perrault: Second, the sunset provision of five years in the proposal before us provides a degree of control over the use of an override clause and allows public debate as to its desirability.

The sunset clause, if you wish to refer to it, honourable senators, is clause 33. Subclause 33(3) reads as follows:

A declaration made under subsection (1) shall cease to have effect five years after it comes into force or on such earlier date as may be specified in the declaration.

It is important to note that the concept of an override clause is not unique; it is not exotic; it is not without precedent in our country. Experience has demonstrated that such a clause is rarely used, and when used its use is usually not controversial.

The 1960 Canadian Bill of Rights, supported by the Leader of the Opposition when it was enacted in 1960, also contains an override provision.

Senator Flynn: Which Leader of the Opposition do you mean? The Liberal Opposition?

Senator Perrault: I am talking about the distinguished Leader of the Opposition in the Senate today.

Senator Flynn: I was Deputy Speaker at that time.

Senator Perrault: I remind him that the late great John Diefenbaker placed an override provision in the 1960 Canadian Bill of Rights. I refer to that document which, in section 2, states:

Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgement or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms—and so on, “in the Canadian bill of Rights.”

Those who often portray Mr. Diefenbaker as one of the zealous protectors of the rights of Canadians—and he was!—surely must be reassured to know that Mr. Diefenbaker supported the “override provision.”

When the Province of Alberta enacted its Bill of Rights in 1972 an override clause was included. Section 2 of the act reads as follows:

Every law of Alberta shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Legislature that it operates notwithstanding The Alberta Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe—and so on.

In 1979 the NDP-dominated legislature of Saskatchewan enacted the Human Rights Code. Section 44 of that Code reads as follows:

Every law of Saskatchewan is inoperative to the extent that it authorizes or requires the doing of anything prohibited by this Act unless it falls within an exemption provided by this Act or unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Legislature to operate notwithstanding this Act.

Thus we see, honourable senators, that governments formed by political parties of various persuasions have supported the concept of the override clause. The concept, then, is not new in Canada.

The Government of Canada has used the “notwithstanding” clause on one occasion. The Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, 1970, which expired on April 30, 1971, contained a non obstante clause, as required by section 2 of the Canadian Bill of Rights. However, the non obstante clause was restricted to certain legal rights of the Canadian Bill of Rights, namely, those provisions dealing with arbitrary detention or imprisonment and denial of bail without just cause—despite the fact that under the provisions of the War Measures Act all the rights in the Canadian Bill of Rights were subject to the override clause.

[Senator Perrault.]

The Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms enacted in 1975 contains an override clause that has been used several times. However, it has never successfully been used in a controversial manner. Quebec has used the “notwithstanding” provision on several occasions. Most limitations imposed by the Quebec government perhaps stem from the fact that the Quebec Charter contains no specific so-called “reasonable limits” clause, and it seems obvious that the government was therefore fearful that without the override the courts might construe the Charter provisions as being without any limits.

Under the Canadian Charter it is felt that “overrides” similar to those enacted by the Quebec government would be unnecessary since section 1 would permit these types of limits. Also, in some cases, the Quebec “overrides” deal with rights not included in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, such as protection for the doctor-patient relationship, lawyers in small claims courts, and so on.

● (1500)

Let me give you a review of its use in Quebec measures. I have a brief summary of some of the applications of it. There is la Loi sur les jurés, 1976, concerning qualifications of jurors in respect of citizenship and unilingual juries. There is la Loi concernant les services de santé dans certains établissements, 1976, which allows a back-to-work order to get around provisions of the Charter. A third use is in la Loi sur la protection de la jeunesse, 1977, allowing juvenile courts to hold in camera sessions. A fourth use is in la Loi sur la libération conditionnelle des détenus, 1978, allowing the granting of, suspension and revocation of release without an independent tribunal, as stipulated in the Charter of Rights. A fifth use is with regard to le Code de procédure civile, 1977—notwithstanding the Charter, a lawyer may not represent a client before small claims court. A sixth use is in le Code de la sécurité routière, 1981—a doctor must report the names of all people unable to drive a motor vehicle, notwithstanding the article in the Charter protecting privileged communication involving professionals. A seventh use is to amend la Loi sur la protection de la jeunesse, 1981—notwithstanding the respect of privileged professional communication in the Charter, professionals must bring forward cases of children needing assistance. These are but a few of the applications of the “override” in the province of Quebec.

It is because of the history of the use of the “override” clause and because of the need for a safety valve to meet absurd situations, for example, without the arduous process of going through the matter of obtaining constitutional amendments, that leading civil libertarians have welcomed its inclusion in the Charter of Rights. One of them, Allan Borovoy, General Counsel to the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, was quoted in the Montreal Gazette of November 7 as saying:

Our reaction is one of great relief. They did not emasculate the Charter.

He went on to say:

The process is a rather ingenious marriage of a bill of rights notion and a parliamentary democracy. The result is a strong charter with an escape valve for the legislatures. The "notwithstanding" clause will be a red flag for opposition parties and the press. That will make it politically difficult for a government to over-ride the Charter. Political difficulty is a reasonable safeguard for the Charter.

The major difference between the original resolution we examined and the one now before us is that Canada will have an amending formula forthwith rather than being faced with two more years of negotiation on an amending procedure. This can only be described as a major achievement. It will mean that Parliament and the legislatures may pursue constitutional change, as the need arises, after patriation without the requirement of unanimous consent and without the probability of consent to changes being contingent upon agreement on an amending formula. The all-or-nothing package approach that led repeatedly to a deadlock among governments in recent years will now be a thing of the past.

Now, what about the Senate? I see some senators listening with interest!

Senator Flynn: It is too bad that Senator Steuart is not present.

Senator Perrault: The Senate will have a key role to play in the amending process. Constitutional amendments can be initiated in this chamber. I know that honourable senators have proposed many very useful ideas in the area of constitutional change and reform, and the subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs made some very valuable suggestions. Also, the consent of the Senate will normally be required for future constitutional amendments.

It is true that the views of the Senate will be subject to being overridden by the House of Commons if, after 180 days have elapsed while Parliament is sitting since adoption of a resolution for constitutional change by the Commons, the Senate has not adopted the resolution. Honourable senators will recall, however, that many members of this chamber have recommended that the Senate have a suspensive veto, rather than an absolute veto, which has been in place since Confederation and very rarely used.

However, to override the Senate, the House of Commons will have to pass its resolution again after the expiry of 180 days. It will not be possible for the Senate to be overridden by executive fiat. There must be a second debate in the Commons and the members of the other place will have before them the views of the Senate and the Senate's reasons for refusing to accede to the proposed amendment. In seeking to override the Senate, the Commons will have to justify, before the people of Canada, its reasons for not accepting the views of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Do you say that seriously?

Senator Perrault: This procedure safeguards an historic function of the Senate which has been used a countless number of times to the benefit of the Senate: the process of sober second thought. Only senators are totally aware of the value of that sober second thought in our parliamentary system.

Senator Flynn: You can say that again.

Senator Perrault: How many times have proposals come before Parliament, been passed in the other chamber and come to the Senate where we, in our usual quiet fashion, point out the defects to the other chamber?

Hon. Jack Marshall: And they pay no attention.

Senator Perrault: The legislation which emerges is infinitely better than many of the measures passed in their original form in the other place. That "sober second thought" proposal continues.

In the last analysis, the views of the Commons will prevail as an elected chamber, but action cannot be taken lightly or precipitously.

The Senate will have a suspensive veto of six months and, in their seeking to override that veto, the Commons will have to address the concerns raised in this chamber. This, honourable senators, is, in my view, reasonable protection for the role of the Senate in the amending process.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: May I ask a question of the Leader of the Government on the precise point of the veto?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Deschatelets: In the past the Senate has never abused, on any occasion, its unlimited veto. Can the Leader of the Government give us the philosophy or the reasoning, if any, as to why clause 47 has been re-introduced? I can perhaps understand a suspensive veto on economic matters, but since we have a function to represent our regions, I think that the absolute veto is necessary, particularly on questions of a constitutional nature. Can the Leader of the Government explain that?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know we all look forward to Senator Deschatelets' contribution to the debate, and he has asked a valid question. I can say that this factor formed part of the negotiations between the federal government and the provinces, that the nine premiers also purport to represent the regions of Canada in their own way. The negotiation which resulted in the consensus included this reference to the Senate.

● (1510)

I know other honourable senators may wish to discuss the point raised by Senator Deschatelets. He has stated that the Senate, in its long period of existence has rarely, if ever, used its veto power. Therefore, it may be asked, "Why keep the veto if it is never used?" I wonder at times whether the Senate has hesitated to use the full strength of its veto power, and because of that, measures which might have been improved have been passed instead of being delayed for redrafting, amending and improving by Parliament. Perhaps having only a suspensive veto might result in greater and more beneficial use of the Senate veto. I know that honourable senators will wish to speak to this point in the course of the debate because Senator Deschatelets has asked a very pertinent question.

I should like to turn once again to the Charter. While patriation with an amending formula is no mean achievement, it is the Charter that gives special meaning to the historic decision that we are now called upon to make. The Charter will enshrine in our Constitution what can be described as the Canadian community of values. It will give substance to the notion of Canadian citizenship. The Constitution Act will establish the status quo of our two official languages. It will recognize the rights of our aboriginal peoples, and it will recognize, as well, our multicultural heritage and preserve it. It will enable our people to move throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and it will enshrine our commitment to promote equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians.

Surely, it should be our honest hope, honourable senators, that future generations will say of us, whether we serve in this chamber or the other place, as they look back on the process in which we are now engaged, that we built better than we knew.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government a question? Perhaps it is a technical question, or one that arises out of relative drafting incompetence in some of the machinery of government. The leader raised the question with respect to the suspensive veto being imposed on the Senate. In section 42(1) the word "only" appears. That section reads as follows:

An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with subsection 38(1):

I do not understand why "only" is in that section unless by implication it excludes the operation of section 47(1), being the suspensive veto.

In normal legislative interpretation, I believe the courts tend to interpret these matters to the effect that if a word is in there, it is in there for a purpose. With my limited experience I cannot reconcile the wording in section 42(1) including the word "only" with the suspensive veto in section 47(1). The leader might take this on notice and refer to some of the erudite legal advisers who, I believe, are hidden somewhere in the Department of Justice, the PCO or the PMO.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, when I, as the mover of this motion, close the debate, I will be most pleased to answer any questions which honourable senators may believe have not been answered adequately before that time. The question will be taken as notice. It is a rather technical question, and we will attempt to find an explanation which will meet Senator Lang's needs.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Leader of the Government agrees that this is a technical matter, and there may be many others. Will he agree to send the resolution to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for it to deal with this technical point?

Senator Marshall: That is a good idea.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hardly think it necessary. I know that his finely-honed sense of humour, once again, has inspired some of Senator Flynn's remarks. The measure before us has been exhaustively examined by supporters of his party in the other place. It has been debated at great length in this chamber. We will welcome the speech that the Leader of the Opposition will give to expand his views.

Senator Flynn: My sense of humour is certainly not equal to that of the Leader of the Government, since he has suggested that when he replies he is going to solve all problems.

Senator Perrault: I did not say I would solve them all.

MOTION TO ADJOURN DEBATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I am not rising to take part in the debate but to move the following motion:

Whereas the National Assembly of Quebec, yesterday, decided unanimously to suspend its sitting as a form of protest against the adoption by the House of Commons of a constitutional resolution which has not the approval of the Province of Quebec;

Whereas the Leader of the Opposition in the National Assembly and Leader of the Liberal Party of Quebec stated yesterday that he "profoundly regrets the fact that important decisions are taken in Ottawa that have not the support of the Province of Quebec";

Whereas it is of extreme importance, as much for Canada as for the Province of Quebec, that an ultimate effort be made to secure the support of the government of the Province of Quebec, and that, at the very least, the federal government agree to amend the constitutional resolution in such a way as to meet the most fundamental objections of the Province of Quebec;

Whereas in an effort to achieve this end, it would be in the national interest to adjourn consideration of the resolution before us, I move, seconded by Senator Murray, that the debate be adjourned to December 14, 1981 at 2:00 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will you allow me to dispense with the preamble?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Flynn, seconded by Senator Murray, that consideration of the present resolution be adjourned and that accordingly the debate be adjourned to December 14, 1981, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the motion is self-explanatory, but I would like to add the following:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It's not debatable.

Senator Flynn: There is nothing in the Standing Orders about a motion for a specific date. It is not a matter of adjournment. But if you raise a point of order, I have no objection.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. As I understand it, a motion to adjourn the debate is not debatable and is to be put and voted on, and if Senator Flynn wishes to give a short explanation, that is fine, but I wish to avoid a debate. Therefore, I reserve the objection on that basis.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: I do not intend to debate this matter all afternoon. If there is a formal objection, I would like the Deputy Leader to tell us the basis for such an objection. I am aware that adjournment alone is not debatable. In this case, we have a motion to adjourn to a specific date, supported by specific reasons regarding the choice of that date. It is not quite the same, and that is why I would have liked to give my grounds for the motion. Does the Deputy Leader of the Government insist on having a ruling on whether or not the motion is debatable? If he insists, of course, the matter may be discussed. We shall see what the Honourable the Speaker and, subsequently, the Senate itself will decide.

● (1520)

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, very well, I quote Bourinot, at page 346, as follows:

It is usual for a member who wishes to have the floor on a future day to move the adjournment of debate, and to give him the priority when it is resumed. The house also frequently agrees to adjourn the debate in order to allow an opportunity to a member to continue his speech on a future occasion.

Bourinot also states categorically at page 350 that "a motion for the adjournment of debate is not debatable nor can it be amended."

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: That is completely irrelevant. It is a good thing for you to quote this passage. However, I did not move adjournment of the debate because I wanted to speak next week. I moved adjournment of the debate because of the events of yesterday and today. I beg your pardon? Is Senator Godfrey laughing?

[English]

What did the honourable senator say?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I was just laughing.

Senator Flynn: But even your laugh is not always very intelligent.

[Translation]

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that nothing in the Standing Orders or in what the Deputy Leader of the Government has just quoted prevents us from having a debate. I am not saying that it should be a very long debate. However, I believe that what occurred yesterday and today was important, and I would like to speak about those events, including the effect that passage of the constitutional resolution has had on the population of Quebec.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on a point of order, do I understand that Senator Flynn is now proceeding with the invitation to say a word or two about this, on the assumption that I am incorrect, or that I have withdrawn my opposition? It is clear that such a motion is not debatable, and that it does not matter whether the motion names a date or not? Bourinot simply refers to a motion for an adjournment, whether to a special date, or to the next sitting, or to any other time.

Some Hon. Senators: Question!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if there is agreement between the leaders I am not going to object, but if there is not, of course you know very well that the motion is not debatable.

Senator Flynn: I do not know very well that it cannot be debated, Your Honour, but if that is your decision, of course, we are going to appeal it.

Hon. Senators: Question!

The Hon. the Speaker: Do you appeal my decision?

Senator Flynn: What is your decision, Your Honour?

The Hon. the Speaker: That I do not think such a motion is in order.

Senator Flynn: Then, Your Honour, very respectfully, we appeal.

Hon. Senators: Question on the motion!

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: My opinion is that the motion of the honourable Leader of the Opposition is not debatable and that we must proceed with the vote on this motion.

Senator Flynn: I object to this decision. I maintain that this type of motion is debatable.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Question!

Senator Flynn: The apathetic Louis Robichaud!

[English]

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on the point of order. I can speak to it, and have every right to, as I am sure the Leader of the Government and the deputy leader would agree. Perhaps that will satisfy those who were muttering about the motion not being debatable.

I rose in the hope that we might have an amicable solution of the situation. I am quite sure—or rather, I think I am sure—that the Leader of the Government and the deputy leader do not at this time wish to prevent the Leader of the Opposition from making a short statement, if that is his wish, as to why he has moved this particular motion. If that is so, I would suggest that the objection, as a point of order, be withheld or postponed, so that we may have a decision as to whether the senators representing the government party are prepared at this time to let the Leader of the Opposition explain his reasons for making this very important and, I would say, unusual motion.

I would just add this, and I think every senator will agree, that it has been the custom of the Senate to allow discussion and debate on motions to adjourn. It happens over and over again. I would say that it happens every week. I would suggest that this is a time for a little compromise, and that it would be in the interests of all of us to hear the Leader of the Opposition tell us why he has made this unusual motion at this time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order of the Honourable Senator Grosart, I did try to make it clear that while reserving what I felt was a proper point of order, namely, that a motion to adjourn is not debatable, it would seem to be appropriate to avoid debate but at the same time give the mover of the motion an opportunity to explain. If we are talking about an opportunity to explain in what I hope would be a non-adversarial way, then I suggest that I and all of us remain non-adversarial in our approach to the matter. I would like to avoid debate, but I think it would be courteous to the Leader of the Opposition to give him an opportunity to explain shortly why he has made this motion. I hope that the Leader of the Opposition will make his remarks in such a way that none of us will have to intervene, but I reserve my point of order.

Senator Flynn: Given the circumstances, I would say that I shall speak for only about three minutes. If the deputy leader wants to reply, we can then have a decision of the Senate.

The facts on which my motion is based are well known. There is no doubt in my mind that the reaction in Quebec, and especially in the National Assembly, to the decision taken by the House of Commons yesterday, has produced quite a commotion. In fact, a poll conducted in Montreal shows this morning that there is now a definite majority favouring the option of the separatist government of Quebec. That is the result, I think, of insisting upon this resolution without the accord of Quebec, and without having met the main objections of Quebec to the resolution.

The purpose of my motion is to enable the Government of Quebec and the government at Ottawa to achieve an accommodation of some kind, rather than continue with this confrontation. If Mr. Lévesque does not want to sign anything, very well; but at least the federal government would have time to consider whether it can make the main concessions to meet the essential objections of Quebec.

For instance, we know that the main objections, with regard to the amending formula, are fiscal compensation for opting out and linguistic rights, which probably could be made subject to an opting-in, as was provided in the agreement with Manitoba, for instance.

As I say, it is very important to have a cooling-off period after the decision of the House of Commons. Certainly, continuing the debate and forcing the passage of the resolution in the Senate would not be conducive to an agreement or a solution. A cooling-off period might even make it possible for Mr. Ryan to convince Mr. Trudeau—whose flexibility the Leader of the Government has just boasted about—to do something significant to avoid the very dangerous consequences of the decision made in the House.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on behalf of the government, may I say that the time for negotiations on the fundamentals of the agreement with the provinces was at the constitutional conference in Ottawa. The PQ was not able to take part and to act in good faith at that Ottawa meeting.

● (1530)

Senator Flynn: What about women's rights and aboriginal rights?

Senator Perrault: Negotiations have not been successful since that time. The nature of its current proposals and statements suggests that it is still not acting sincerely and only wishes to ensure that the process of constitutional change and reform bogs down and that there are further delays. We do not believe that a delay in the debate in this chamber is at all appropriate, when so many senators have shown their willingness to participate in the debate and, indeed, have asked for the opportunity to speak. Under those circumstances, we cannot accept the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition.

The Prime Minister has made this statement in Quebec City:

The kind of compromise I am proposing, if it can be accepted in the next few days, well and good. But if it can't, you know, the offer will still be there in the weeks and months to come. And some day when the Government of Quebec is once again in the hands of a party that believes in Canada, then we can do it at that point.

Just as members of the other chamber were given an opportunity to debate this issue, we wish to give senators the opportunity they have requested. The senators waiting to speak today and tomorrow afternoon wish to contribute to this historic debate. The suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition that we postpone the debate for another two weeks is really not worthy of the great party he represents.

Senator Flynn: That is the most stupid argument I have ever heard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that the debate be adjourned until December 14.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.
And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion of Senator Flynn lost.

[English]

Senator Flynn: Quebec is really isolated by both sides, Alberta and Newfoundland; there is no doubt about that.

Senator Perrault: Come off it!

Senator Austin: It is only the PQ that is isolated.

Senator Perrault: Make sure you pour lots of gasoline on it.

Senator Flynn: Who said something about the PQ? You know nothing of what you say.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, now that we have returned to the motion before us, I hope it will be permissible, in dealing with constitutional matters of this kind, to make use of an antique phrase and say that the annals of the high court of Parliament, of which we are a portion, will record as historic and to be remembered the debates of December 1981, when this Parliament and the country were engaged in re-working its Constitution. Whether these efforts will be for good or for ill only the light of history will show. I hope that we can be happy with what we do. But this chamber of second thought is the last link in the Canadian process by which this great measure will be authorized. If we rise to our opportunities and recognize our responsibilities, this last link may by no means be an anticlimax in the process, nor will it indicate that the Senate is a body without power or influence. And as I reflect upon these attitudes, which I hope the Senate will adopt with respect to this problem, I present some personal thoughts on the matter that lies before us.

● (1550)

Let us look at the good things. There is one thing I am sure about. It is that this is not the same resolution that was offered to us 12 months ago, because in the interval it has suffered a startling sea change into something quite different both in character and inspiration; and this time, with one lamentable exception, it bears the stamp of constitutional legitimacy, which was totally lacking the first time it was presented to us.

Twelve months ago it seemed that, conforming to an odious, secret federal battle plan leaked to Canada in October 1980, a ruthless unilateralism was indeed in the saddle; that the canons of the Canadian Confederation, established over 114 years, were to be set at naught; that the provinces were to be coerced and that the Supreme Court was to be circumvented. Ends were invoked to justify the means—which, of course, they never do. It did not work. In the interval the patient merit of the stand taken by members of this party, led by its leader, Joe Clark, the stern admonition that was administered by the Supreme Court, the consensus of the provinces, and, above all, the public understanding of the process, broke that untrammelled torrent and returned the powerful waters of Canadian national feeling into the trusted channels of consensus and consultation—a 180-degree turn which quite transformed the nature of the document that is now before us.

The Supreme Court played a memorable part in what went on. The initiative of the Provinces of Manitoba, Newfoundland and Quebec, dragging Ottawa willy nilly with them, brought this matter to the court, and I pay my tribute of appreciation, for whatever it may be worth, to the public service that was rendered our country in the judgment of that court when it re-established the landmarks of our Constitution.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: It underlined the dominant principle of Canadian constitutional law—the principle of federalism—and it condemned the principle of unilateralism. It described the spacious limits of the Canadian Constitution, consisting not of any single document like the British North America Act, but the broad conventions of the Constitution, some written and some unwritten, but all recognized. From this flowed the doctrine that some conventions may indeed be more important than law, and that Canadian conventions required that there should be a substantial consensus between the federal government and the provinces of this country if we were to have a constitutional change that was legitimate in the constitutional sense.

● (1600)

The Supreme Court made it clear that the system of unilateralism was constitutionally illegitimate. As a result, following that precept, we have returned to the federal principle in our country. That is the first and basic modification to the resolution we have before us, that it is based on consensus and that unilateralism has been rejected.

There is a second change to which I wish to draw your attention because it goes to the very heart of the federal Constitution. The second change I would like you to notice is the sea change that has taken place in the way in which we are now to amend the Constitution of Canada in the future.

Through the long debates on the Constitution—and heaven knows I had the privilege of listening to them both in this house and in the joint committee of both houses—through the long debates, in spite of argument, the government clung to the formula which allowed two provinces to exercise a veto on the Constitution of our country, and which allowed sundry regions to exercise veto powers as well, creating different classes of constitutional rights by province and by citizenship.

This endeavour to enshrine a paramount power in the central provinces of the country, in Ontario and Quebec, was wrong in theory and it was wrong in application. There is a world of difference between giving Quebec and Ontario, or any region, a national veto permitting them to block progress for everybody in the Constitution and a local veto, as provided in the Accord reached by the eight provinces in April 1981, on the opting-out principle, where the power of one province was limited to blocking the change insofar as it applied to itself.

That matter of the amending formula for our country was again one of those problems which yielded to successful consultation—and a modification, a drastic modification, of the federal insistence on what was seen by all in the end to be an unacceptable amending formula—and the introduction and acceptance of one more consonant with the principle of federalism, one which was developed and espoused by the eight provinces when they met in April of this year. This is a key provision that has drastically altered the nature of the document before us.

There is another key provision, which I am glad to see has been eliminated, and that is the use of referenda as an amending tool. That was enshrined in the original document we had before us, but is now completely gone.

The history of referenda in Canada is scarcely a happy one. Instead of underlining democratic decision-making, as some people would hold, it has in fact crystalized on more occasions than one the differences that divide rather than the principles that unite. In a federal nation of the character of ours, with its distinct regions and its two great national tongues, referenda run the risk of setting region against region to no national advantage. I for one am glad to see that it has been abandoned as a constitutional amending mechanism enshrined in the Constitution of the land.

Hon. Charles McElman: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I hope you will be as agreeable about some of the other things I have to say, but I thank you for that intervention.

Senator McElman: I shall wait for your further observations.

Senator Roblin: Very good.

There has been concern about the Charter of Rights. That was mentioned in the speech earlier this afternoon and that surely is a highly emotional issue. The Charter of Rights appeared to us in the first instance surrounded by a policy of full and absolute entrenchment. That was the settled policy of the administration.

I was interested today to hear that they have seen the light on the road—wherever they were going and from wherever they were coming—and have now found that this policy of full and absolute entrenchment can well be modified in the public interest. Because here again consensus and consultation, the federal system, the Canadian way, yielded better solutions than the unilateral document we were asked to subscribe to in the first instance.

Because, honourable senators, rights we will have! The Constitution as we have it now, the Charter as we have it now, provides explicit standards against which the conduct of governments or bureaucrats or just plain people can be measured in the time to come.

This system of a Charter of Rights in the document before us gives these rights a paramountcy which they never had before, and there is an appeal to the courts so that we may have some satisfaction that abuses will be checked. Our basic set of values as a society has indeed been established by the Charter in our Constitution, and it will be maintained by the courts.

Yet at the same time, honourable senators, the override clause, that particularly typical Canadian solution of a difficult problem, leaves the elected, and I trust responsible, representatives of the people the ultimate arbiters of what these basic values are. But if there is to be any change in the basic values enunciated in the Charter by the use of this override provision, it will only be exercised under a public scrutiny which I think will be effective in retaining it within the bounds that the citizens of this country require.

Standards will change; standards will broaden out; and there is a means by which we may respond to the changing requirements of our society as time goes on.

There was never anything by the wit of man so well devised, or so sure established, which in the continuance of time hath not been corrupted.

That is true, senators, even of entrenched charters and entrenched constitutions. We recognize that fact in providing for the ultimate supremacy of Parliament, and we have indeed succeeded in blending an entrenched system of rights with parliamentary democracy. That is an achievement of consultation and consensus and it, too, has altered in a fundamental and important character the nature of the proposals we have before us.

So far, so good. We have seen these happy developments that have altered entirely the frame upon which these proposals hang. We have seen the process of federalism recognized. We have seen an amending formula which meets the needs of this nation, and we have seen the recognition of the supremacy of Parliament, while at the same time taking nothing away from the Charter of Rights for which our people have expressed their support.

Canadian federalism, as far as I have now proceeded, has indeed been restored. For that I am happy and I am willing to include in the circle of my congratulations anyone who had anything constructive to do with that. I am willing to include in my felicitations everyone from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of this country down to the hundreds of people who wrote letters to members of this chamber, as they did to me, because they all had their part to play. Although at times the going seemed tough and the resistance to be stiff, it turned out that in the balance we found that degree of compromise and consensus and consultation which could lead, and which only can lead, to a happy issue of these great events.

So far, so good. The sea change that I have mentioned is indeed real. This is not the same resolution that we first debated in this house, and as you may have gathered I am happy that that is so. But there is something else to do before the work is perfected, and I express my object in this respect in a single phrase, and that phrase is the "Province of Quebec". Quebec, viewed by some as excluded from the consensus, but viewed by others as excluding herself from the consensus—whatever the case may be—has now placed us in a situation of uncertainty and of strain which must cause concern for all who love their country.

● (1610)

What is the Province of Quebec? Is it one province like the rest in normative constitutional terms? Perhaps one can answer yes. But in the social and human sense and even in the constitutional perspective, one is compelled to answer no. The Province of Quebec since 1867 has enjoyed special recognitions, and I refer merely to the differences of language and law to underline my point. And within Canada it is the home of our unique French-speaking community with its own cultures and its own perceptions, and to deny these attributes is to deny reason and fact.

Indeed, the reconciliation of the French fact within the broader Canadian federalism has been the perpetual challenge to Canadian statesmanship ever since our country first took form. The French fact is a unique ingredient of our Canadian personality, and that consideration has always been central to our constitutional development in the years gone by. We did not do a very good job in dealing with it in 1840, as members of this chamber will recall. We bungled it, but the great triumph of the constitutional development of 1867 was that it provided the answer to that question in the terms of those days. I think perhaps that 1867 is reflected in large measure in 1981, because it is a sad and tragic irony that the present situation, and I would even go so far as to say the whole question of constitutional reform as presented to us by the Prime Minister of Canada, is based on the assertion that it is the response of Canada and Canadians to the referendum on sovereignty association of last year.

The Canadian response to the referendum of last year lies at the base of the whole constitutional exercise, and we are told that what we do is grounded on our sacred responsibility to reconcile the people of Quebec to the system of Canadian federalism. We were told, or it has been implied that these undertakings had to be pursued in order to discharge our obligation to those who voted "No" in that great referendum. Yet, in spite of that fact—and what word better than "irony" fits the situation—with a francophone Prime Minister and a majority of 70-odd francophones from Quebec in support of the Prime Minister, the opinion in the Province of Quebec today is one that is very difficult to ignore, one that has been expressed by the united voice of the National Assembly as recently as last night, which expressed serious reservations about what we do here.

There are two points that stand out in this difficulty. The first point has to do with language, and I will let others, if they wish, speak on that subject. The other point has to do with the so-called Quebec veto, and I intend to address myself to this topic. Whether the question with respect to these two matters is one of reality or one of perception—and one can argue it both ways—the emotional weight cannot be discounted, no matter how we do it. To Quebecers, the question of the Quebec veto boils down to a situation where they see a majority imposing a change on an unwilling minority.

That central question was, indeed, the one that was addressed by the provinces when they reached their agreement in April 1981. Eight provinces, including the Province of Quebec, were able to conclude an Accord which had as one of its main features the amending formula that would be applied to this country in the future.

It seems to me that in that statesman-like measure, the idea of provincial vetoes was surrendered because if one province like Quebec, or any other province with the same power, could impose its constitutional view on the rest, that would be a blocking veto. The provinces decided, I think with wisdom, to abandon the concept of a blocking veto and, instead, to adopt a principle of opting out, which would have the effect that no province is compelled to accept a constitutional amendment that affects its provincial powers if it thinks that that amendment is against its best interests.

However, in order to guard against force majeure or the power of the purse, the province opting out of a constitutional amendment was to receive full financial compensation if the circumstances reasonably required it.

All eight provinces, including the Province of Quebec, agreed. Thus it was thought that the legitimate special interests of a province could be protected in a Canadian constitutional amending formula consistent with the long-held practices of Canadian federalism. But somewhere along the way from April to now there was dropped from the federal-provincial Accord, which is enshrined in the resolution before us, the provision for full financial compensation on opting out.

In April of this year, eight provinces agreed on full fiscal compensation. To my knowledge none of the eight provinces since then—and I think I could include the other two—have sought to abandon this concept of fiscal compensation. One can only speculate as to why what was good in April came to be torpedoed in December.

The arguments for opposing fiscal compensation have been freely articulated, and I want to deal with them. They are four in number. First, it would lead to a constitutional checkerboard.

Senator Frith: Through opposing fiscal compensation?

Senator Roblin: I am coming to that.

Senator Frith: I just want to be sure of what you are saying. You are now giving your reasons against any compensation, are you not?

Senator Roblin: I am giving the arguments against full fiscal compensation. We will deal with the cultural and educational matters in due course, because I would not want the honourable senator to accuse me of having overlooked that very important matter.

To get back to what I was saying, the second argument is that the rich provinces would somehow reap an undue advantage; third, that it is too late to do anything now; and, fourth, that it would break the Accord. In my submission, none of these objections will stand serious analysis. I want to be clear about the point at issue. I am speaking about amendments to the Constitution which transfer power from the provinces to the federal government. In the entire history of our 114 years, I know of only two amendments of that nature of any significance. One is the Old Age Security Act and the other is the Unemployment Insurance Act. Both were constitutional amendments and both were settled by agreement.

However, some will say to me, "What about medicare, hospital insurance and educational grants?" The plain fact of the matter is that as important and vital as those measures are, none of them involved a constitutional amendment. All were brought in without the transfer of constitutional powers. They operate solely by administrative arrangements outside the Constitution, and none of those subjects would fall within the orbit of the opting out clause with full fiscal compensation which we are discussing.

This argument presented very eloquently by, I think, the Prime Minister himself, and certainly by Mr. Broadbent, that there would be a fear of checkerboarding or undue financial advantage, certainly could not arise because of the measures contained in the amendment that I propose to put to this house to restore full financial compensation in respect of opting out of amendments to the Constitution which affect provincial powers.

Checkerboarding and undue financial gain might arise if new administrative changes of the kind that I have mentioned, such as medicare, hospital insurance and educational funds, were brought in. They could be brought in without any reference to the Constitution at all under federal spending power. This power gives the Government of Canada full control as to whether a checkerboard could arise from these matters, and as to whether a rich province could opt out of that particular administrative arrangement to its own financial advantage.

So it seems to me that we could very well afford to adopt a generous policy on full financial compensation where constitutional amendments are concerned, because our history shows that they have not been the point of difficulty or trouble where problems have arisen. They are in another area entirely, and in an area entirely under the full control of the federal government. The federal government does not want to do it. It does not have to. The federal government, of course, really does not believe that full financial compensation is a bad thing. They do not believe that at all. They have blown their cover, and I commend them for it. They decided to modify the financial compensation clause but limit it to education and other cultural matters. On these, compensation is agreed.

● (1620)

In the debate in the other place, the Honourable Serge Joyal, when speaking to this matter—to the very amendment which I propose to introduce in a few moments—stated that the government did not reject the principle of full financial compensation, and that they would certainly give it consideration, but, he said, only after patriation. I suggest that that is an implication of approval. It seems to me that if that is the position of the Government of Canada, and, if it is good, the time to do it is now. But we are told there is not time to do it now. There was time to look after the question of women's rights, was there not? There was time to look after the question of aboriginal rights, was there not? Why is there not time to take care of this matter in connection with the Province of Quebec? It has been observed that if we did it we would be breaking the Accord. Where was the Accord on women's rights when it started? Where was the Accord on aboriginal policy when it started? Nowhere. But they achieved the Accord.

Today we have eight provinces which, as of last April, agreed with the proposals I am putting forward now, and it seems to me there would be no difficulty in having them agree again. There would be a consensus for full financial compensation if only the federal government would come in. To delay now seems to be, in my opinion, reprehensible.

The events of the last few days must certainly give us cause to ponder the wisdom of the course we are following. To delay now is damaging to Canadian unity. We are not dealing with a new theory. Before the constitutional resolution was ever thought of, the idea of fiscal compensation was a well understood and accepted practice in federal-provincial relations, even though constitutional amendments were not involved but merely institutional arrangements. Why do we now refuse when, by conceding to this change, we will make a significant step, I think, to bring Quebec within the Canadian consensus.

It is in harmony with the Accord of the provinces in April. It sets no new precedent. There is time and there can be a consensus. It does give the reassurance that all parties in Quebec have been asking for if we bring this amendment in. Considerations of national unity—perhaps I might even go so far as to say good faith—are the best advocates that could be brought to support the proposition that I wish to put before you.

Some will say to me, "Why bother? You could never reconcile separatism with federalism." That is not my objective. I am not concerned with reconciling the irreconcilable. I am not concerned with catering to separatists in the province of Quebec. I am concerned with reconciling the federalists in the province of Quebec to what we are doing here in this house. Thus, in the closing days of this constitutional reform process, it seems to me that the Senate of Canada has a unique opportunity to justify its creation. We can insist now on sober second thoughts. We can defend a reasoned and reasonable provincial interest. We can make a substantial contribution toward bringing Quebec back into the consensus.

I am not at all satisfied that if you adopt my motion this afternoon that all problems will disappear, or the world will be sweetness and light. We know that is not so. We know that in all probability if one problem is solved others may be presented that have not been thought of before by people who are not really looking for a solution in any event.

That is not the question which we should concern ourselves with. Our concern ought to be to represent the posture of the people of Canada and the Parliament of Canada to the Province of Quebec in such a way that the federalist citizens of that province, the people who voted "No" in the referendum, will regard us as their understanding friends in the necessity of reconciling the French fact within the ambit of the Canadian federation.

Honourable senators, this is the final hour. There is really no place to hide. The Constitution gives the power to the Senate to do what I suggest. The imperatives of Canadian federalism gives us the right, in my opinion, to do what I suggest. All we need is the will to do it.

From ocean to ocean most Canadians believe that they are members of a great, sensible and potentially prosperous nation. We believe that Canada is greater than the sum of its parts, but we also believe that each province has its place in the national structure. If one province feels it is being excluded from that circle, we cannot be content.

To leave something undone that might assure a greater degree of adherence to the consensus in Quebec, which would indicate a proper respect to that province as part of our federation, is something that should not be left to our charge. Let us make sure that our reformed Constitution reflects the grave concerns which animated the Fathers of Confederation in 1867 and, I know, animate many Canadians today. Consensus without Quebec opens some deep and uncharted waters which must make us all very uneasy.

The way is open for the federalists in Quebec to accept the Canadian consensus if they see the Parliament of this country dealing with their two concerns of language and of the amending formula.

The amendment which I now intend to move, I suggest, is a step along the right path. It deserves support. It will widen the consensus, and it will justify the institutions which we protest we serve.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 be amended by striking out Section 40 and substituting the following therefore:

"40. In the event that a province dissents from an amendment conferring legislative jurisdiction on Parliament, the Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of that province, taking into account the per capita costs to exercise that jurisdiction in the provinces which have approved the amendment."

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to Senator Roblin with respect to the substantive part of his motion to amend.

If I understand correctly, the purpose is to provide that any province would obtain full compensation if it sought to opt out of a constitutional amendment in the case where there are seven consenting provinces. The practical effect of what you are suggesting is that, in cases where claims for compensation could be laid, the rule of unanimity be put back into the Constitution. You were talking a few minutes ago of a substantial number of the provinces being necessary, and you were defending the integrity of the majority of the provinces in what they wanted and agreed to, which does not offer compensation to Quebec.

My question is: Are you saying you are for what nine provinces want, which is substantial agreement, but you also wish the rule of unanimity to apply?

Senator Roblin: I am afraid I do not see the force of that argument. I do not think it follows in the slightest from what I have been proposing. I am saying that when the Constitution of Canada is amended, in such a way that it affects provincial rights, by seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population and the federal government, if one of the three provinces does not agree with that, it has the right on its own behalf to contract out. I do not see any principle of complete unanimity in that.

Senator Austin: I should like to press the point for just a moment and say that if we are providing full compensation to one, two or three provinces, then, indeed, it leads all provinces to wish to be treated equally.

● (1630)

In that case, each province is in a negotiating position with regard to the compensation it seeks, so that even if you had five or six provinces that were willing to accept a constitutional amendment, or perhaps seven, if the rules applied equally to all, you would not obtain that. Senator Roblin has been premier of Manitoba, and I believe that what he is saying has the practical negotiating effect of introducing the concept of the rule of unanimity. I also believe that Premier Lévesque consented to opting out, but with full compensation, because he realized, in practical terms, that it required unanimity.

Senator Roblin: I guess my honourable friend is telling me what I told him, so I guess I did not tell him very well in the first place.

What I was trying to tell him is that on this question of full compensation it enabled a province to exercise a local veto—that is, a veto with respect to its own activities—but one that would not affect the other provinces in the way that the old veto proposals certainly would. While I hear what my honourable friends says to me about unanimity being introduced by the back door, I just do not concede that as a probability.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I merely see it as a problem of a convoy, and the convoy proceeding at the speed of the slowest ship.

Senator Roblin: I do not think that is true at all. I think that what this thing does is to release us from the veto of Ontario and Quebec, that could slow the speed of the whole convoy down to nothing. This system allows the convoy to proceed, even if one of the ships wants to flag off in another direction.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we are at this moment in a position that we did not deal with, although we anticipated it. We did not deal with exactly how we were going to handle debates on amendments. We have agreed—and this is in an order of the chamber—that we will postpone votes until the end, vote on all the amendments together, and then vote on the main motion.

With regard to how we deal with speaking to an amendment, I suggest that His Honour should now ask for any speakers on the amendment. Then, when they have spoken, deferred votes will automatically follow. We will not have to move anything further in this connection, because once it is declared that there are no more speakers on the amendment, it will automatically be deferred for a vote.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, there seems to me to be a problem with that. I hope it is not a real one, but I want to draw it to your attention anyway.

[Senator Roblin.]

If His Honour calls for all speakers who wish to speak to the amendment, and they do—and they should be relevant, of course, and speak only to the amendment—what happens when the turn of that same speaker comes around, if he so desires, to speak to the main motion? Is he excluded from dealing with matters he spoke about on the amendment?

Senator Frith: As I recall it, that was one thing we did agree upon. I thought Senator Flynn and I agreed that the answer to that question would be that such a speaker would not be so limited. He could at any time be told that he was not speaking in a manner relevant to the amendment, but as long as he sticks to the amendment he is not losing his place on the main motion.

There are other ways of doing it. We could do it on the basis that whenever anyone rises to speak on the amendment they could be taken as speaking to the main motion, but that then they would be giving up the right to speak on subsequent amendments. I really do not think that there is any way of handling this question other than to exhaust all the speakers on the amendment as long as what they are saying is relevant to the amendment. They have not given up their right to speak on the main motion.

If there is another way of dealing with the matter, I should be glad to hear about it.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I am not suggesting another way. Really, all I wanted to do was make sure this problem would not arise as we went along. I do recall, as a matter of fact, now that the honourable senator mentions it, that the agreement was of the kind he has just described. That, however, was not the way he expressed the problem a moment ago, and I suppose that was because he thought we would all recall what had been previously agreed.

Senator Frith: Actually, we did not make an agreement on this earlier. We said we would defer votes, and see how we wanted to handle an amendment when one was moved. In any event, unless I hear to the contrary, I take it we agree on this.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have prepared a speech which deals not only with what Senator Roblin has raised, but other things as well. Everything is meshed in with everything else. I do not see why we have to have separate debates on the two things. We can deal with them both at the same time. If we did it in any other way I would have to rewrite my speech, and I do not want to do that.

Senator Frith: We anticipated that we would have to clarify this. I am not suggesting that you are limited. Certainly any senator can rise and say, "I wish to speak to the amendment," and then say, "I am now going to go on with my main speech." In that case he is in effect saying that he is prepared to deal with both matters. That will be his turn at speaking. I just do not think that anyone who wants to make a short intervention only on the amendment should not be permitted to do so.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I would just like to make a comment. I am thoroughly confused. Has the question been proposed?

Senator Frith: I believe it has.

Senator Grosart: The question has not been proposed. The deputy leader was giving us a lecture a little while ago on obeying the rules, but I cannot think of anyone more in breach of the rules in speaking for several minutes as he when there is no question before the house. If we are going to be as precise as he suggests, let us start now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 be amended by striking out Section 40 and substituting the following therefor:

"40. In the event that a province dissents from an amendment conferring legislative jurisdiction on Parliament, the Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of that province, taking into account the per capita costs to exercise that jurisdiction in the provinces which have approved the amendment."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, on the point of order, now that the question has been proposed, I want to say that I have no quarrel with the deputy leader as to how this should be done, but there may be another way of doing it that might meet the problem raised by Senator Godfrey, and perhaps also the one that Senator Manning was about to raise.

I would suggest that if someone wants to speak to the main motion, but not to the amendment, he should say so. He would then be allowed to make whatever speech he wants. If, however, he wants to speak on the amendment itself, and not forego his right to speak on the main motion, he should say that also, and make sure that what he says is relevant. I think in this manner we could probably solve both problems. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to doing that.

It has been understood, in any event, that the vote would take place at the end. We can do it this way, or we can do it in some other way, but if Senator Godfrey is satisfied with that we can at least try it at this time.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, perhaps I might offer a suggestion. It seems to me that there is a simple way of dealing with this procedure. It might not be provided for specifically in our rules, but certainly it could be done with the consent of the Senate.

Why could we not regard this amendment, and others that may be made, as simply alternative clauses to the ones which they purport to replace, and not place any restriction on any honourable senator's freedom to discuss the alternative proposal, or the one which is now before the house. In that way we do not have to deal with debates on the amendments separately from the debate on the resolution.

● (1640)

At the end, the votes can be taken in order, as has already been agreed to. It seems to me that if we try to draw a distinction between debate on the amendments and debate on the main resolution, we will only be complicating our procedures. This amendment contains a suggested alternative to what the resolution now proposes. Surely, in debating the main resolution it is quite appropriate for some honourable senators to refer to the alternative proposal, if he or she wants to. It saves two lines of debate proceeding at one time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think the suggestion of Senator Manning is an excellent one, as long as we understand the reason for the alternative rule, which is to give a senator an opportunity to speak on an amendment without foregoing his right to speak on the main motion as well. That is the only reason for the other rule. Otherwise, it is a cumbersome procedure. The suggestion of Senator Manning is much more reasonable.

Therefore, as long as we understand each other on that point, I do not see why we should not proceed in the manner suggested by Senator Manning.

We have deferred the vote on all amendments. Any speaker can speak on whatever there is as an amendment. If somebody says, "Oh, there was an amendment which I really wanted to speak to, but it came up after my speech," why not deal with such a situation as it arises? If that is satisfactory to everyone, we will so proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please remember, honourable senators, that, pursuant to the order adopted on December 2, 1981, a recorded division is deferred. That means that we can have a debate on the amendments, but the vote is deferred.

Senator Flynn: Yes, the question will be put at the end of the debate.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, the first thing I would like to say is that whether or not one agrees with Senator Roblin, I thought he gave an excellent speech, one well worthy of the occasion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I do not intend to make a long speech today. I have already spoken twice on the Constitution—on January 23, 1979, and on March 11, 1981.

One of my reasons for speaking today is to register my delight at the final outcome and to announce that, unlike the last resolution, I will not have to hold my nose when I vote for this one.

I wish that, like so many of my fellow senators who, as Senator Perrault pointed out in his speech today, worked long and hard on the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons considering this resolution, I could lay some claim to having contributed to the improvement in the drafting of the resolution laid before both houses and to this successful outcome. There were some 10 senators appointed originally to represent the Senate on this committee. I was not one of them. There were some 41 senators who substituted for the regular members of the committee. Again, I was not one of those either. It was not because I did not want to take part in those proceedings. The simple fact is that I was never asked, and I would say with good reason.

I have always been interested in constitutional and Senate reform. When the special Senate committee was formed back in 1978 to consider Bill C-60 on constitutional reform, I faithfully attended the meetings. Practically all of those meetings took place when the Senate was adjourned. During those meetings I frequently found myself in disagreement with what I would call "the establishment" in the Senate.

If that was not bad enough, the speech I gave in this chamber in January 1979 put me in the minority as far as my party was concerned. May I remind honourable senators that, in that speech, I said that in the hearings of the Constitution committee I was particularly impressed with the evidence of two persons: the Honourable J. C. McRuer, formerly Chief Justice of the High Court of Ontario, who had headed up a royal commission inquiring into civil rights in Ontario in 1964; and Professor Walter Tarnopolsky, an internationally recognized authority on civil rights, who was then president of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association. Professor Tarnopolsky has, apparently, gained recent respectability with the government, because the Leader of the Government in the Senate recently quoted his approving words about the new resolution.

As I pointed out in that speech, I have long regarded entrenchment of a bill of rights as the equivalent of motherhood. In fact, I voted in the committee for an entrenched bill of rights.

Professor Tarnopolsky had convinced me that it is not so important to have a bill of rights entrenched in the Constitution as it is simply to have it in the Constitution. The mere fact that it is in the Constitution gives it an overriding effect on other legislation, particularly so in the case of subsequent legislation, which it might not have if it were not in the Constitution. Mr. McRuer stated:

It has been the history of entrenched bills of rights that the courts have distorted the language of such a bill to give it entirely different meanings . . . I do not think that judges are the best interpreters for the purpose of legislating what is meant by general language.

He argued that a bill of rights should be amendable in the ordinary way so that interpretations by the courts, which Parliament does not think reflect the intent of the bill of rights, can be easily corrected.

I stated in my speech:

From a practical point of view I am sure that any government would be very loath to amend a Bill of Rights to change an interpretation made by the courts unless it was convinced that public opinion was very strongly behind it.

Sounds familiar, doesn't it? Often we have heard this argument, or something like it, in the past few weeks since the Accord was reached, and of course it was repeated by Senator Perrault in his speech today.

[Senator Godfrey.]

I concluded my speech by saying that, because the provinces were against an entrenched bill of rights, I thought:

that this is one area where I believe compromise by the federal government is in order. In fact, in order to get agreement with the provinces on a Bill of Rights I would go as far as agreeing to a "notwithstanding" clause similar to the one in the present Bill of Rights.

I did not know, at the time, that a similar proposal had been made by the Honourable Otto Lang to Mr. Blakeney during the televised proceedings of the first ministers' conference in 1978. Furthermore, Dr. Tarnopolsky informed me that in 1975, at the annual meeting of the Law Teachers' Association, he had stated that the inclusion of a "notwithstanding" clause might be the best way to proceed, in view of our long tradition that Parliament and the legislatures—not the courts—should be ultimately supreme in their respective fields of jurisdiction.

I cannot, therefore, lay any claim to fame for having first thought of the idea. In all honesty, I will have to give up calling it the "Godfrey formula" in view of what I have learned since first giving it that name in my speech last March. In any event, it never did catch on. I will, however, continue to refer to it as a "notwithstanding" clause rather than using the term "override" which seems to be gaining favour.

Since I last spoke in this chamber on the subject, there have been three considerations that have been brought to my attention concerning a bill of rights. These have greatly impressed me.

The first was a statement by Professor Tarnopolsky, in which he pointed out that 85 per cent of the cases dealing with a bill of rights have nothing whatsoever to do with the validity of statutes, but instead deal with the conduct of police and administrative officials. I phoned Dr. Tarnopolsky to check this figure, and he advised me that the correct figure in the United States would be over 98 per cent. He stated that in the twentieth century no act of the federal Congress was held invalid because of the American Bill of Rights until 1965, although there were some state statutes that were held invalid.

The second was a statement by the Honourable Otto Lang contained in a letter to me, commenting on the speech I had given on the constitutional resolution in March of this year. He said:

I had started my life as a holder of a view against a charter on the grounds of legislative power. As I observed government in action I came to conclude that in far too many cases, simple neglect or too little attention would leave an individual deprived of rights where a legislature really did not intend and would not want to support that result. In short, I tend to believe that the courts can be helpful in individual cases where a cumbersome legislative process cannot. On the other hand, I also tend to believe that there is little danger of a court really taking power away from a legislature in case of a real confrontation, and so I can live with a charter quite happily.

● (1650)

The third was when Dr. Tarnopolsky recalled to my mind the infamous Police Bill No. 99 which the Attorney General of Ontario, Mr. Cass, introduced in 1964. We can all recall the uproar with which this was greeted from the public and the press, particularly when Mr. Cass admitted that it offended against generally accepted principles of civil rights. The outcome was that the bill was withdrawn. Mr. Cass resigned as attorney general, his very promising political career in ruins. Mr. Robarts, in an effort to repair some of the damage, appointed the McRuer Commission to look into the whole question of civil rights and a bill of rights. That surely demonstrates that politicians tamper with civil rights at their peril, and that they would never use a "notwithstanding" clause except where it was fully justified and public opinion was solidly behind them.

The use of the "notwithstanding" clause in those cases in Quebec, referred to by the Leader of the Government in the Senate today, surely illustrates the kind of instances where its use is fully justified. Those three pieces of information have served to strengthen the opinion I had that a "notwithstanding" clause was, as I stated:

a reasonable compromise that would have met the fundamental objections of some of the Premiers to an entrenched Bill of Rights, namely, that the legislatures and not the courts should be in the last resort responsible for protecting our liberties.

As I pointed out in that speech, I would have exempted language rights from the provisions for a "notwithstanding" clause "because the provinces have all previously agreed to that."

I disagreed with a majority of my colleagues in the Senate in one other respect, and said so rather forcibly to any of my fellow senators who had the patience to listen to me. I felt very strongly that the Senate should not have an absolute power of veto over its own reform or abolishment. The "Gang of 24", ably led by Senator Steuart, managed to persuade the government that they would be able to defeat the resolution, so the government gave in because it recognized the realities of the situation, namely, that the Senate would never vote down a resolution providing for its reform or abolishment if the House of Commons had agreed to it, and had been supported by a large majority of the provinces pursuant to the provisions of an amending formula. The government, therefore, deleted clause 44 and restored the Senate's full right of veto.

That their assessment of the situation was correct—that the Senate would never abuse its power of absolute veto—is demonstrated by the present resolution which restores the original provision and which permits the Senate to be abolished or reformed without its consent. This resolution, however, has the support of nine out of the ten provinces so that the Senate, quite properly, is apparently going along with it; and the "Gang of 24", as a group, has sunk back into the oblivion from which it never should have emerged in the first place.

I should like at this point to make a comment about Senator Deschatelet's question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He made the statement that the Senate had never abused its full power of veto. I think that is rather overstating the case and that he should have confined his statement to the last 50 years. There were times in the 1920s when I would say, as a small "1" liberal, that they abused it quite often. One instance that comes to my mind concerned the question of section 98 of the Criminal Code of Canada. Four years in a row the King government passed an act abolishing section 98 which stated that anyone who belonged to an organization which advocated overthrowing the government by force could be sent to jail. That really meant that, if you belonged to the Communist Party, you could be thrown in jail. As you may recall, in the early 1930s, the Bennett government used section 98, since it was still in force as a result of the action of the Senate, and sent Tim Buck and four or five other Communists to jail for five years or more.

I think we have to confine our statement that the Senate has never abused its full power of veto to modern times.

While I cannot claim to have had any influence whatsoever on the shaping of the final resolution and the re-drafting of the original, I will make one claim, and that is that no one can claim to be more pleased with the final outcome than I was. When I heard the news of the breakthrough on the last day of the premiers' meeting, I think that euphoric, even ecstatic, would describe my feelings. The fact that Premier René Lévesque did not agree was, to me, irrelevant. Of course, he would never agree to anything that would strengthen the federation. He wants Quebec to separate. What did worry me was whether he could bamboozle the people of Quebec.

I thought Mr. Claude Ryan's reaction would be a key to the situation. I was disappointed in his initial reaction, but I thought the three suggestions for improvement which he made three days later were very sensible ones. Two of them have been accepted and are included in the present resolution, and the third concerning mobility rights is not that important. The federal government has indicated that this matter will be favourably considered in the future when the amending formula is in place.

Quebec is still a worry, particularly with all the talk in the media about that province being isolated, when in fact only Premier Lévesque himself and his government are isolated. However, if Mr. Claude Ryan goes all out in genuine active support of this resolution, I think the majority of the people in Quebec will again support Canada and not the separatist aspirations of their present government.

Finally, in that connection, I would refer to a speech of Mr. Broadbent, reported in Tuesday's Globe and Mail. Mr. Broadbent took the position that it was not unreasonable, if seven of the provinces in English-speaking Canada and the federal government agreed to transfer provincial jurisdiction to Ottawa, presumably so that some specific federal program could be instituted, that Quebec could opt out and receive compensation, so that it was not having to pay for the programs of the other provinces through federal taxes as well as, in some cases, paying for its own. Quebec has opted out and received compensation in the past, as has been pointed out today, notably with respect to the Canada Pension Plan. This would undoubtedly happen in the future in the event of a similar situation. When you think of it that way, really you have to wonder what the fuss is all about. As reported in the press, Mr. Broadbent pointed out—

This proposal would not transfer new powers to Quebec. Nor would it cost other taxpayers any money; nor would it amount to “incremental separation” as some have erroneously suggested. It would simply enable Quebecers to retain what was already theirs. It would simply give them a positive option—the free choice to join with others in an amendment or to retain what has historically been theirs.

As Senator Roblin pointed out, Mr. Joyal has indicated the federal government is softening its position on this matter and would consider an amendment to that effect after our Constitution is home and the amending formula is in place.

This would be an opportunity to show the goodwill of English-speaking Canada regarding something that is, in my opinion, really theoretical. I firmly believe that protection of its education and language rights is all Quebec really needs. However, if Quebecers perceive that they need more, then give it to them along the lines suggested by Mr. Broadbent because it will not make any practical difference. The time to do it—and in this I disagree with Senator Roblin—is immediately the Constitution is returned to this country with an amending formula, not now when it would involve a further renegotiation with the premiers and further delay.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, unless I am mistaken, according to the decision made earlier with respect to the speeches we wish to make, I must first clearly state that I will speak only to the amendment and that my comments will have a direct bearing on this subject. Is that, in fact, what was agreed? So I can say now that today I will be speaking only to the amendment, and I will be entitled to speak to the resolution subsequently. Is that correct?

Senator Frith: If I am not mistaken, you may now speak either to the amendment or to the main motion. Actually, we are urging senators to deal with both subjects before the Senate, namely the main motion and the amendment, at the same time. If another amendment is moved subsequently, you will still be allowed to speak to it.

Senator Tremblay: That is not what the agreement was, according to my leader. As I understand it, if I want to speak to the amendment alone at this stage, I will still be allowed to speak to the main motion. I do not have to speak to the amendment and the main motion at the same time, at this point.

Senator Frith: That is correct, but you will have to be brief if you decide to speak only to the amendment; in that case you may speak only on that subject.

[Senator Godfrey.]

Senator Tremblay: Agreed, we understand each other perfectly. My comments, which will be quite brief, will directly concern the amendment. My first comment is related to an earlier question by Senator Austin and to several comments made just now by Senator Godfrey. I have the impression that it might be useful to review the meaning or scope given the fiscal compensation clause at the time it was included as part of the process of seeking a general amending formula.

Of course, people refer to it as an opting-out clause, but that is not entirely correct; it is a clause denoting non-participation in an amendment that would transfer provincial powers or jurisdictions to the Parliament of Canada. The reason why an opting out clause was included and associated with fiscal compensation is, it seems to me, that this was a compromise solution. At least fifteen years have been spent discussing an amending formula with veto rights. There would be one veto for Quebec, one for Ontario and vetoes for the other regions. As far as Quebec was concerned, having a veto right would enable it to oppose any changes in the constitution that did not concur with its own views. However, some provinces found that the veto concept created classes of provinces, and they have emphasized this point, especially since the 1971 conference.

In the past two years, and especially last year, a formula was finally found which did not have the rigidity of the veto concept and which at the same time—I think Quebec had considerable input—allowed some provinces to choose not to accept a constitutional amendment that would transfer provincial powers to the central government. In the formula's first edition, as it were—at first it was called the Alberta formula, which later became the Vancouver formula, because that was where most of the discussions took place—only referred to non-opting-in. However, it soon became clear that opting-in was very easy for provinces that were not anxious to preserve certain powers, but was a problem for other provinces, particularly Quebec. In fact, opting in alone, without a fiscal compensation clause, meant there would always be the obligation to choose between money or provincial powers. That is the crux of the problem. For a province that wants to preserve one of its powers if there is no fiscal compensation there is always this dilemma, because since it has to pay for the programs corresponding to the jurisdiction that would be transferred to the federal government, the province would have to apply some kind of double taxation to its citizens. In the final instance, it is the people of the province who are penalized.

So, in order to get away from the rigid veto concept which brings everything to a standstill as soon as it is exercised by one of the provinces, and in order to have a more flexible definition of the majority concept, a formula was finally designed combining non-opting-in with fiscal compensation. I think we should see fiscal compensation as a way of putting all the provinces on an equal footing. Or, more specifically, the citizens of each province. The provinces and the people of those provinces are no longer faced with the dilemma of having to choose between money and power, that is, the preservation of that power. So that is the essence of the formula. I feel that it is a compromise between rigidity, flexibility and equity. It combines equity with flexibility.

Another point which has already been made, and I think people now understand—at first, there was some confusion as a result of misinterpretations—is, that the non-opting-in and compensation formula applies only in the case of a transfer of existing provincial powers to the federal government and not vice versa, as some people have claimed.

That formula therefore became part of the process, as I said before. At this point I should stress even more than I have the inseparable nature of those two aspects of the formula. I think that Quebec in particular had made a significant compromise when accepting for instance not to continue linking patriation with jurisdictional changes tending to increase provincial powers. For Quebec, this was something absolutely not dissociable. As I said in other circumstances, from the time financial compensation was withdrawn, it became impossible for Quebec to accept the amending formula, because these two items in Quebec's and every other province's viewpoint totally complement each other.

But lo and behold, at the early November conference, in the final episode of the negotiations, that clause was deleted outright. It must be stressed that the clause was withdrawn at the initiative of the federal government, the Prime Minister himself. One only has to read what he said on November 5, in the afternoon, when he came to the other place to report on what had happened in the preceding days and the conclusions that had been drawn that same morning. This is what he said:

We deleted this measure, with the agreement of the nine provinces—

It is stated quite clearly, in my view, that the initiative came from the federal government, and indeed a number of statements made in various circumstances could be referred to where reluctance and, to all practical purposes, the refusal of that financial compensation provision was expressed by the federal government.

Why was that clause deleted? The same day, within the same context, the Prime Minister gave a number of reasons, and here I must quote from the part where he himself caused the confusion I referred to earlier concerning the direction in which changes would be made.

What has been removed, Madam Speaker, is a constitutional provision that would have obliged the national government to compensate, in financial or fiscal terms, a province that would exercise its opting-out right, and conversely, would probably have obliged the provinces to compensate the federal government for parting with any of its jurisdictions.

This is where it gets quite equivocal. The Prime Minister is talking as if the amendments in question, which would imply the opting-out option with financial compensation, could work both ways. This had never been the case. It always had to do with amendments restricted to a transfer of existing jurisdictions from the provinces to the central government.

● (1710)

Anyway, here is the explanation he gave on that day:

We deleted this measure, with the agreement of the nine provinces, for a very simple reason. We want to avoid a situation in which the national government would be prevented from having its constitutional amendment approved by a province that would say: I am opting out and you are going to pay me for doing just that. And this, I can assure the House, does not apply only to Quebec. I am thinking, for instance, of a constitutional amendment pursuant to which the Canadian government would want to amend the Constitution so as to allow the national government to legislate on pensions and make them portable for the elderly from province to province.

If one of the wealthy provinces such as Alberta or Ontario—and this obviously applies to Quebec as well—were to say that it was opting out of the agreement and that we would be obliged to pay compensation, this would make it impossible, Madam Speaker, or at least very difficult, both fiscally and financially, to adopt such a measure. And it is for this very simple reason that the passage was removed—it is an important one, I realize that—from the April Accord. It was done with the consent of the nine provinces, and this morning I explained at length the spirit in which it was done, to the Premier of Quebec.

Well, that first argument I would call the argument of the rich provinces. Let us see if we can analyze it. Let us suppose we have a program which requires expenditures; of course, there is no problem when it is an expenditure-free transfer of jurisdictions to set up a program which would entail fairly large provincial outlays to the federal government.

Let us suppose that the ten provinces are in agreement. What is the financial position of the federal government? Taking over the jurisdiction and setting up program "X" now allowed after the transfer of jurisdiction, it would have to finance the whole program throughout Canada. To put it in concrete terms, that would amount to a per capita expenditure across Canada.

What I fail to see in the argument is how it would change anything in the financial position of the federal government if it were to agree that one, two or perhaps three provinces administer the program and get financial compensation, namely the per capita amount the federal government would have spent anyway to launch its program. I can see only one difference and it is not a problem of rich or poor provinces; instead of spending directly, the federal government would spend the same amount through the provinces which, by definition, would retain the jurisdiction transferred by others to the federal government.

I admit that I do not quite understand how this can create a financial problem since, as the Prime Minister suggested

This would complicate, fiscally and financially, the idea of such a measure.

It seems to me that the fiscal and financial position of the federal government remains unchanged. In both cases, it is responsible for the whole program and spends the required amount per capita. It either spends it directly or it spends it through the provinces which have opted out. I fail to see any financial problem.

Other arguments have been put forward, which Senator Roblin has emphasized I think. I will not go back on it. But the Prime Minister himself went back on this argument about pensions and their transferability from one place to another, and that was dealt with in several speeches and comments.

First, I would draw attention to the fact that the problem was solved with respect to the Canada Pension Plan. What happened at the time? A pension plan was set up for all Canadians. Quebec negotiated to establish its own pension plan. All this was done in accordance with those very principles the Prime Minister seems to be so concerned with. Both the Canadian and Quebec plans are universal and portable. This type of problem was solved in the past so why could it not be solved in the future? However, given the general philosophy on which our federalism operates at this time, the general philosophy of the government in power, it might well have objections to this type of solution, a Canada plan and a Quebec plan. It would not have anything to do with portability. Portability is part of the solution. There must be other reasons. Probably the very idea of a province having its own plan, even if it complies with the two basic requirements. Everything else is a matter of administration by the provincial government instead of the federal government. The problem is exactly the same as far as the financial compensation is concerned, according to the arguments raised.

The financial situation of the federal government is the same but instead of directly paying the recipients under a program, the government would pay the so-called opting-out through two or three provinces. In that respect, there are surely two visions of Canada, as the Prime Minister often likes to say. I do not know who mentioned it, but I think that it was the Prime Minister who said this system amounted to piecemeal or phased-in separatism. This argument appears to me to be senseless, all things being considered. You cannot equate retention of provincial powers, with separatism. The provinces already have those powers which are entrenched in the Constitution. When one, two or three provinces retain their jurisdictions as I said, instead of transferring them to the federal government, how can it be called piecemeal separatism?

It seems to me that, in point of fact, there would be less centralization for those provinces than for the others which agreed to transfer some of the powers they already had to the central government, I insist on that point. In fact, if there is anything wrong with that formula, it is precisely that it only guarantees the status quo. There have been times when some of the provinces, one of which was Quebec, asked for increased powers, and that was a stumbling block at some of the conferences. That play has been left out of the game, if I can put it that way, in the last year or so.

[Senator Tremblay.]

The compensation does one thing only: it recognizes, enshrines and protects the status quo. If we have reached the stage where to say that protecting the status quo is separatism, I must say I really do not know what to make of it.

● (1720)

But we are now refuting arguments which the government failed to refute in so many words, at least not spoken. But it did so by its behaviour, by inserting a truncated clause providing for financial compensation but only in matters pertaining to education and culture.

If ever there was any principle underlying the arguments I have just analyzed, I think it has now disappeared or did so on November 18 when the new resolution was tabled in the House of Commons. One question remains: By virtue of what new principle, since the first one has disappeared? Because, or so it seems to me, principles should be in full. If half the principle disappears, then, the whole is done away with. Would there be a new principle that would warrant the setting up of two categories of provincial jurisdictions, those which would be covered by the financial compensation clause, and those which would not? Would there be two categories, those covered and those not covered? I have not heard anybody mention such a principle. Perhaps I have not read quite as much as I should have, but I have heard no argument which would warrant the division of the financial compensation coverage. I have not heard any argument either in justification of a division such as this: education and culture on one side, and the other areas on the other side.

I would not want to make any gratuitous assumptions, but what are these other areas? The reply could be "property and civil law", or "matters of economic powers." This might explain everything. On economic matters, in case there is a certain majority, it would mean that the provinces which wanted to keep their economic powers would face a dilemma. Therefore, they would be forced to opt-in. The government should be told that a constitutional amendment is necessary on this because it is clearly seeking outright centralization. Under these circumstances, it would have been better to keep either the consensus or an amending formula which would protect the provinces bent on opting-out.

I do not understand the need to separate this protection in two. I will say this: If the principle is good enough for education and culture, it should be good enough for the rest. It seems to me that we are coming back again to the heart of this formula, meaning that there is first and foremost a principle of equity involved as far as provincial taxpayers are concerned. In this respect, we must assume that the provinces reflect the views of their own communities. These communities should not be faced with the dilemma of having to choose between jurisdictions on the basis of their perception of the means required to define themselves and their pocketbooks.

I suggest that this is clearly a principle of equity. And it is on this principle of equity that I have based my support for the amendment moved by Senator Roblin.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on a point of order, do I understand that this speech was to deal exclusively with the motion in amendment?

Senator Tremblay: That is what I said at the beginning. I hope that in my speech I have, in fact, been dealing directly with that subject.

Senator Frith: I am raising this point only because the honourable senator had also said his speech would be brief, and I hate to think what he will consider to be a normal speech on the main motion.

Senator Tremblay: Do not worry!

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Do I have Senator Tremblay's permission to ask a question?

Senator Tremblay: Of course.

Senator Deschatelets: We all know you were a senior official in the civil service in Quebec and that you know how the opting-out policy has worked for provinces that wanted fiscal compensation. From your experience during the first ten years of this policy, could you tell us whether it was used primarily by the Province of Quebec to request financial compensation in cases where it preferred not to relinquish its jurisdiction? Would you be able to answer that question?

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I can only give you my impression, such as it is. I think Quebec has not been the only province to ever make use of this kind of non-opting-in or opting-out, but in practice, it was often the only province to do so.

● (1730)

[English]

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I am ahead of most of you because I have already celebrated. I was over at the House of Commons yesterday, along with some other honourable senators, when the four votes were dealt with. I joined the chorus line in singing O Canada. If you did not hear me over here, it was not because I was not singing loud enough.

Senator Flynn: If you didn't hear me, it was because I wasn't singing.

Senator Croll: I spoke on the Constitution on March 24 this year. I endorsed the package and supported the Charter of Rights in its original form. My comments appear in Hansard of March 24, at pages 2132 and 2140, and therein my wisdom is contained. I am not going to repeat my comments to you again today. I endorsed it in its totality. I endorsed it from fifty years of practical, political experience. I did not read about it; I lived it.

I consider it a privilege today to speak on this occasion on the matter of patriation of the Constitution with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I look upon this as a historic occasion. It comes to me as a reward for many years of service. I am pleased to be able to contribute to the debate today.

There have been three memorable occasions in the life of my country in which I have participated politically. The first was my active participation in the enactment of the Citizenship Act. That was a dream I shared with many Canadians who were first generation Canadians, as I am. The second occasion was the flag debate. That was a long drawn-out affair. It was emotional. I shared in that emotion and regretted the casting aside of the Union Jack. I had fought under it, but the time had come for change, as it does with all symbols. It had to be done, and we did it.

Now comes the Constitution with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I have lived a long time without a Constitution and have got along very well. I can continue to live without it, but the Charter of Rights is far more important. Patriation of the Constitution would make me feel good, but the Charter of Rights would make me do good.

Today we can cast off our cloak of colonialism. From now on we are fully on our own. I feel the sense of pride that this vote will bring to millions of Canadians.

When I spoke in the Senate in March, I said that I was certain that what the government was doing was legal, and it was. I was more concerned with the Charter of Rights than I was with patriation of the Constitution. I felt that the Charter of Rights was our social passport to the twenty-first century. I pictured it as a beautiful beginning to freedom, liberty, rights and security to be enjoyed by all Canadians wherever they are. That was my hope and dream.

Unfortunately, it was not to be. It became a hollow victory, with the overriding and "notwithstanding" provisions which my friend, Senator Godfrey, loved so much. I wish that the words "override" and "notwithstanding" had never been born in the English language, for they have both done almost irreparable damage.

The Charter of Rights is now subject to provincial override. Provincial legislatures may pass laws overriding the rights, amongst others, of the physically and mentally handicapped. You would have thought that there would have been some sympathetic "give" there. What a poor excuse to claim that they could not afford to provide access to public transportation for handicapped persons. It was a mere excuse and a low blow. Provinces may also pass legislation which overrides the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The hope is that the overriding legislation must be renewed every five years.

When the Charter of Rights was transformed into the best in the world by Canadians themselves, as they argued their case before the Senate-Commons committee, more than 80 per cent of Canadians, according to the polls, were in favour of the charter. As one columnist rightly said: "The Charter of Rights has been transformed into a Charter of Powers."

Provincial premiers unjustifiably taking on the right to speak for all citizens on all matters have emasculated the Charter to protect their own powers and advance the interests of their bureaucracies.

The Charter of Rights was designed and based upon trust. The "Charter of Powers", designed by provincial premiers, is based upon mistrust. The provinces have shot the Charter of Rights full of holes.

What the Charter rightly calls "fundamental freedoms"—freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of association—are put at the mercy of 10 provincial legislatures which can override them at will.

Senator Flynn: Parliament can also do that, not only the provincial legislatures.

Senator Croll: The same applies to legal rights, such as the right to habeas corpus, the right to public trial, the right to counsel, the right to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure, and the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned.

The same applies to equality rights, the right to equal protection and equal benefit of the law, prohibiting discrimination on grounds of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

One of the prime objectives of the Charter was supposed to be national unity—equal rights and equal treatment for all Canadians from sea to sea. Now the rights will vary from province to province in a legal crazy quilt. This is a shattering blow to national unity. Well, you have to live with some things.

Politics has its own reward for the hardship and sacrifice of political life. The pride and satisfaction on an occasion such as this are our reward and payment. This gives a great feeling of having done something of value for your fellow man. When the Charter of Rights came before Parliament, I endorsed it fully. I said to myself, "Well, old boy, you have it made. This is what you have always been asking for and hoping for. Once it is finished, it will be time to move on and out." That, however, was not to be. The provincial premiers have messed things up, and now we have another generation of work ahead of us, work that must be done. This is a historic decision, nevertheless, that spurs us on to greater efforts. There is much to do for tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow.

I told you that I am a first-generation Canadian. In my family there are now three generations growing up. I feel they will be proud to know that their father, their grandfather and their great-grandfather played a positive role in these historic events in the life of our country. I hope all Canadians will feel that way.

In supporting this motion I hope I have paid my dues. We have lost a generation of social advance. It will take us that long to catch up on our promises of freedom, liberty and security. When we have passed the bill we will still be balkanized, however. It is not what we expected, but it is the best that is possible at this time, and it is better than that which was available yesterday. This is progress. I do not like the package. I think the federal government gave away too much. I am, however, a loyal rebel, and so I endorse it and embrace it.

It would not be right for me to sit down without saying a word about the man who is entitled to the credit for all of this, namely, Pierre Elliott Trudeau. He sacrificed much but gained much more, and history will write his name in big letters. We will remember him for a very long time.

[Senator Croll.]

We must also couple with his name that of Jean Chrétien, the Minister of Justice, the great conciliator, the master of consensus. He made possible what sometimes seemed impossible.

Senator Flynn: Go and tell them that in Quebec.

Senator Croll: In this vote, we now become part of history.

Senator Flynn: I have two questions for Senator Croll.

Senator Croll is very happy with the Charter of Rights. Is he happy that we have a British Charter of Rights? You are asking us to adopt the Charter of Rights. Are you happy with that?

Secondly, you are very happy with the consensus. Would you say that in Quebec?

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, in view of the time, I assume that it would be preferable to adjourn now and continue the debate after dinner.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, Senator Manning has called it 6 o'clock. Do you agree, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will realize that we resume automatically at 8 o'clock. The bell will ring, of course. The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.10 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—
MOTION RESPECTING DISPOSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

That the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada be disposed of as follows:

At five o'clock p.m. on Tuesday, 8th December, 1981, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and put all questions necessary to dispose of the said motion.

He said: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the indulgence of Senator Manning, who is the next speaker in the debate, to allow me an opportunity to take care of some housekeeping matters of importance to all senators.

Honourable senators will recall that we have a house order that deals with the beginning of this debate. We passed that order. We left until today or tomorrow the discussion of a time at which we would feel that ample opportunity had been given to all senators who wished to speak, and ample opportunity for amendments to be made.

Honourable senators will note that this motion is virtually identical to the second paragraph of the previous motion, the paragraph that was withdrawn. The date has now been filled in, that date being Tuesday next, the 8th of December, 1981, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, of course there is no problem with accepting the motion. I simply want to confirm that this motion conforms with the discussions which were held between the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the Government and some of the senators on this side of the chamber.

At this time I merely want to point out that the Leader of the Government, as is customary, should have the last word in this debate. I, too, should have the opportunity to speak at the end of the debate. If, by 5 o'clock on Tuesday, this has not occurred, perhaps the vote will have to be postponed for an hour or so, or perhaps even delayed until later on in the evening. I would simply like to say that 5 o'clock is the time agreed upon unless circumstances warrant unanimous approval, in good faith, of a postponement to a later time on the same day.

I do not think we should be strictly bound by setting the time at 5 o'clock. If someone has something more to say, I think we should allow him to say it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, under our rules we can, with unanimous consent, make changes to fit the circumstances. I feel that what the honourable senator has said really applies to every order that we make; namely, that we reserve the right to change something so long as we have unanimous agreement. We will not be the victims of our own order. The order will, however, provide that the vote be taken at 5 o'clock.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will want to know about the schedule for sittings between now and the time of the vote. The understanding and agreement between the leadership on this side of the chamber and that on the other side is as follows: We will sit tomorrow morning from 10 o'clock until 12.30 p.m., and again from 2 until 4.30 in the afternoon. That will give us four to four-and-a-half hours for debate. We would not need any order thereafter because the rules come into effect to bring us here on Monday at 2 o'clock.

We intend to sit on Monday at 2 o'clock in the afternoon and again at 8 o'clock in the evening. We will then sit Tuesday afternoon unless we find that, because we need the extra time, we wish to sit Tuesday morning as well. Otherwise we will simply let the rules apply and sit at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Therefore, honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, December 4, 1981, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN— MOTION FOR TELEVISION OF FINAL VOTE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

That pool television cameras and pool newspaper photographers be permitted in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of recording the final vote on the motion of the Leader of the Government in the Senate for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators will have watched and enjoyed—or, at least will have been interested in—the reporting of the vote in the other place. A request has been made by the media that it be permitted entry into the Senate chamber to record the final vote on the motion respecting the Constitution. Permission is needed for that. I repeat, the request is for Senate approval of the simple recording of the vote, which will be held, according to our order, at 5 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

● (2010)

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I enter this debate sharing at least one mutual bond with all other honourable senators in this chamber. Whatever our assessment of the constitutional package may be, we surely share a mutual sense of relief that this phase of this long divisive exercise is finally drawing to its close. I say "this phase" because the consequences of what is being done are still ahead of us. We should not be under any illusions as to how serious those consequences may be.

Before we give our final judgment on this matter, we should recognize that we have come full circle in what started out as an effort to preserve the national unity of this country. If this constitutional package is approved here and at Westminster, we will be back precisely where we were a year ago as far as the Quebec-versus-the-rest-of-Canada issue is concerned, except the positions will be more polarized and the Quebec government's anger at what it interprets as a betrayal will make future negotiations even more difficult than before.

With the birth of the Parti Québécois some years ago, Canadians became aware that growing dissatisfaction in Quebec posed a real and serious danger to Confederation. That awareness and concern increased with the election of a separatist government. More and more voices warned that Quebec would move to separate from Canada unless our federal system were restructured to give the French Canadian majority in Quebec more latitude to be masters within their own house.

The concept of a new federalism was born and the term "new federalism" was interpreted by Quebecers to mean more latitude provincially to fulfil their particular aspirations and desires, not separate from, but as an integral part of Canada. The concept of greater latitude to fulfil regional aspirations elicited a warm response from other regions of Canada, especially western Canada where many people had, for years, felt left out of the national decision-making process.

The idea of a new federalism, a restructuring of Confederation with a view to addressing these long-standing provincial and regional grievances, gained a substantial measure of public support.

I do not know if it was the rising tide of these desires, especially in Quebec, or a personal obsession to re-make the face of Canada in his own image, that caused the Prime Minister to embark on the course that has brought us as a nation to the situation in which we find ourselves today. I do know that, when Quebec pressures for fundamental change reached the point at which the separatist government launched a referendum on what it called "sovereignty association"—which was really separation under another name—the Prime Minister made some strong and effective pleas to his fellow French Canadians. He pleaded with them to reject the referendum; he urged them to reject sovereignty association. He said, in effect, "Reject the idea of severing your traditional ties with the rest of Canada and we will ensure that your future will be far greater as an integral part of Canada than you can hope for by going it alone. We will reform our federal structure so that you can be masters within your own house in those matters which are of special importance to you."

Public leaders generally throughout Canada endorsed the Prime Minister's proposition and supported his appeal. They welcomed the proposed restructuring and modernizing of Confederation, not only to meet Quebec's concerns, but because they saw in it a solution to many regional grievances in western Canada and in the Atlantic provinces.

A majority of Quebecers took the Prime Minister at his word. They rejected sovereignty association; they rejected Premier Lévesque's anti-Canada propaganda; and they voted to remain a part of Canada and of the new federalism which they were promised.

Following the referendum, the Prime Minister initiated the process that was supposed to lead to that new co-operative federalism. He convened a First Ministers' Conference on constitutional reform. He proposed to patriate the B.N.A. Act with an amending formula, and he wanted an entrenched Charter of Rights. The scope of the proposals was too broad to afford a realistic hope of general agreement. A committee of ministers was set up to work for a consensus, but the time frame imposed was too restricted to afford hope of success.

As the discussions proceeded, it became obvious that the Prime Minister's concept of what Canada should be was fundamentally different from that of most of the provincial governments. Instead of a greater recognition of provincial concerns and interests, the Prime Minister wanted a stronger federal role to be the cornerstone of any new federalism. But he wanted more—he wanted the provinces to join in asking the Government of Great Britain to entrench in the Canadian Constitution a Charter of Rights that would fundamentally change the Canadian pattern of parliamentary democracy.

The British tradition with respect to the supremacy of Parliament, that had been our heritage since our birth as a nation, was to be set aside, and our Constitution was to be Americanized. No longer were the people's representatives to be trusted with the guardianship of citizens' rights; instead, these rights were to be spelled out and entrenched in the Constitution and henceforth the appointed judges of the courts, not the elected representatives of the people, would be the guardians of citizens' rights and the adjudicators when those rights were in dispute.

Not surprisingly, the committee was unable to reach a consensus, and a further First Ministers' Conference resulted in eight of the ten provincial governments rejecting the federal proposals.

The Prime Minister then embarked on a course of unilateral action. He was persuaded to reconsider his ill-advised decision by two things: First, the judgment of the Supreme Court to which he referred the constitutionality of his proposed course of action only when forced to do so by Parliament; and, second, the realization that, in the light of the court's decision, there was little prospect that Westminster would approve his package without the concurrence of at least a majority of the provinces.

That an Accord was finally reached with nine of the ten provinces is a tribute to those who were striving to bind up the nation's wounds, and it is something for which we can all be thankful. Had the Prime Minister persisted with his unilateral action, he would have inflicted irreparable damage on Confederation and might well have destroyed it entirely. He would have gravely damaged relations between Canada and Great Britain which, in turn, would have caused further deep resentment in many regions of Canada. We can surely all agree that if we are to proceed at all with the constitutional package, it is far better for us to proceed with at least near unanimous accord than in the manner proposed by the Prime Minister.

Since the Accord, and since a measure of agreement has been reached on the issue of women's rights and aboriginal rights, there has been a good deal of self-congratulation, particularly among government members in both houses. It is nice to see them so happy. But many concerned Canadians must be wondering what real grounds there are for all the self-applauding. I come back to what I have said about the initial situation that more than anything else gave birth to this long and tortuous exercise. It was Quebec's threat of separation; and after all the painful hassle we have gone through, where does Quebec stand in this matter today? She stands precisely where she stood before, only more self-isolated than ever from the rest of Canada, more polarized, more angry and more resentful because she feels she was betrayed.

I want to emphasize that I believe the Quebec government is wrong and extremely unwise in rejecting the Accord. I believe the Prime Minister is right when he says that Premier Lévesque never wanted an Accord. He is a separatist, wholly committed to taking Quebec out of Confederation, and his consistent goal has been to prove that Confederation does not and cannot work as far as Quebec is concerned. For that he deserves the condemnation of the Canadian people, both francophones and anglophones.

Senator Flynn: Hear, hear.

Senator Manning: But it must be recognized that he has now been given more grounds than he had before—

Senator Flynn: Right on.

Senator Manning: —to argue that Quebec cannot hope to fulfil its aspirations within Confederation. There is nothing in the constitutional package that meets the commitment given Quebecers—

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator Manning: —that they would have more latitude to be masters in their own house.

Senator Flynn: Right on.

Senator Manning: The Prime Minister's Charter of Rights restricts the power of the Quebec Assembly, as it does the legislature of every other province, more than they were restricted before, because the Charter clearly takes away their right to legislate in areas in which they have been free to legislate in the past.

An Hon. Senator: He gets it through the people.

Senator Manning: We should be forgiven for wondering if the Prime Minister has really thought through the dangers to the future unity of Canada inherent in the course to which he has committed himself and Parliament.

An Hon. Senator: He trusts the people.

Senator Manning: If the package is passed by both houses of Parliament, Westminster will undoubtedly pass it, in view of the Accord reached with nine of the ten provinces. The Constitution and Charter will then become binding on all Canadians and Canadian governments. But if the Quebec government refuses to recognize and be bound by it, as it already has said it will, precisely what can and will the federal government then do? If the government ignores open defiance of the Constitution, it will be bowing to anarchy and will undermine if not destroy one of the cardinal principles on which the Charter itself says Canada was founded, namely, the rule of law. If it tries to enforce the Constitution by court judgments and sanctions, or other harsh means, it will create a situation that Premier Lévesque will misrepresent as persecution of French Canada by English Canada, and create an environment in which he might well win another referendum on separation, which would almost certainly ensure the break-up of Confederation.

The question I ask the Prime Minister, the question I ask all honourable senators, the question I ask myself, is this: Are the actual benefits to Canada in the constitutional package now before us sufficient to justify creating a situation that may well produce such dire results? In my own best judgment, the answer is no. There is no real profit in gaining a new Constitution if in the process you lose a nation.

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Manning: Before this house of sober, second thought gives its decision, we should seriously consider not only the substance but the implications of what we are being asked to approve, and whether the ultimate end will be a profit or a loss for Canada. The patriation of the B.N.A. Act certainly is a desirable step, and one which has strong support from the Canadian people. By approving the package we will also be adopting a reasonably good amending formula—not necessarily the best formula, but one which has general support and which can be further refined at a later date.

If the package contained only those two proposals, it would pose no threat to Canada's future and would command enthusiastic public and government support. An accord on those two provisions, involving all 11 governments, could have been reached months ago. The package would have had a speedy passage through Parliament and speedy approval by Westminster. By now patriation with an amending formula would have been an accomplished fact.

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator Manning: We would have avoided the long divisive debate that has consumed so much time and effort on the part of all governments, while far more urgent economic issues have gone unattended and the country has slipped deeper and deeper into recession.

An Hon. Senator: Indeed.

Senator Manning: But the constitutional reform package was not restricted to those two basic provisions. Instead, the Prime Minister insisted on including his Charter of Rights, and immediately the package became a highly controversial and divisive document, making the negotiation of even an incomplete accord a long and tortuous exercise. As a result of all that effort, what precisely do we now have?

First, we have a Charter that requires the abandonment of the long-standing British tradition under which Canada's parliamentary democracy has operated successfully for over 100 years.

Secondly, we have a Charter poorly drafted and containing ambiguous terms which insure costly and time-consuming litigation before the courts finally establish what, in their opinion, many of the provisions actually mean.

Thirdly, we have a Charter that has been accepted only with reluctance and without enthusiasm by the majority of the nine provincial governments that finally signed the Accord, and then only after it had been modified by the insertion of "notwithstanding" clauses to the point where it is self-contradictory and satisfies none completely and many not at all.

The fundamental right to own property and not be deprived thereof without due process and just compensation is not in the Charter at all. The provisions to protect women's rights are still being criticized as incomplete and unacceptable. Widespread dissatisfaction still prevails regarding aboriginal rights. Civil rights groups are charging that the Charter is still woefully defective in many respects. Law enforcement organizations are condemning it because it will make the enforcement of criminal law even more difficult than it is now. Pro-life groups are condemning it because it doesn't protect the yet unborn. Spokesmen for the physically handicapped and disabled say it is unacceptable. Even the Prime Minister is now dissatisfied because it is no longer the Charter he wanted. Such is the finished product we are now asked to approve.

● (2030)

Is this the hallmark of statesmanship? Is this the crowning glory of inspired national leadership? Is this that for which men hope to have their names emblazoned in the annals of history by a grateful citizenry? Surely the Canadian people deserve better than this. Surely a nation's constitution should be a document that by its excellence commands respect and spontaneous public support—the embodiment of their hopes and aspirations and ideals in a document which people welcome and accept and embrace with enthusiasm and pride. Not by any stretch of the imagination does this Charter of Rights fall into that category.

Coming back to the main point of concern I have already expressed, the inclusion of this Charter more than anything else is what is keeping a province with over 25 per cent of Canada's population from signing the Accord, and, if adopted, it will pose the dangerous, unnecessary and unacceptable risk of precipitating Quebec's separation from Canada. It is a ticking constitutional time bomb with the potential to blow Confederation apart.

Senator Walker: Hear, hear.

Senator Manning: I appreciate that what is proposed places senators from Quebec in a difficult position and forces them to make a very difficult decision. The attitude and conduct of Quebec's separatist government is repugnant to everyone who cherishes Canadian nationhood and the importance of harmonious relations between the provinces united by the ties of Confederation.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Manning: Quebec's Bill 101 and the manner in which it is being administered has placed the one million anglophones in Quebec in an intolerable position, and is embarrassing to francophones as well.

[Senator Manning.]

Many no doubt feel that a federal Charter of Rights may be the solution to the unacceptable situation Quebec's separatist government has created within the province. But I remind honourable senators that a national Charter of Rights will not help the Quebec situation unless it is respected in Quebec, and such respect is not assured simply because a Charter has been passed by Parliament. What we have to consider is whether having regard to the attitude of Quebec's present government the latter end, if this Charter is passed, will be better or worse than the first.

Finally, honourable senators, I remind you of a lesson we can learn from Canadian history as it relates to past efforts to bring about constitutional reform. As far back as 1931, this matter was debated when the Statute of Westminster was under consideration by the British Parliament. Because a consensus on an amending formula could not be reached, Canada asked that the amending process be left at Westminster to be exercised only at Canada's request and for such amendments to the B.N.A. Act as Canada desired. To say that this left Canada in a colonial status is utter nonsense. Canada has been completely free from colonial status ever since the Statute of Westminster was passed 50 years ago.

The Prime Minister tried to justify his proposed unilateral action by claiming that for over 50 years Canadian governments have been striving constantly but without success to reach a consensus on patriation and an amending formula. I was privileged to participate in every federal-provincial conference at which the Constitution was discussed between 1935 and 1968, and I assure you the true story is something very different.

From time to time constitutional reform was placed on the agenda, sometimes by the federal government, sometimes by one or more of the provinces. The discussions were never carried on under any sense of urgency. The subject was approached from the premise that patriation and an amending formula were desirable, if agreement could first be reached. On every occasion when it became obvious that to pursue the matter further would be divisive and detrimental to national unity, the issue was set aside by mutual consent, sometimes for several years. There was a shared conviction that what the country would lose by forcing the issue was more than it would gain.

That pattern prevailed during the entire regime of Prime Minister Mackenzie King, Mr. St. Laurent, and the late Mr. Lester Pearson. In the mid-1960s under Mr. Pearson's leadership a concerted effort was made to reach an accord on patriation and an amending formula in time to complete the exercise by Canada's Centennial Year. After a long series of meetings of provincial attorneys general, chaired by the federal Minister of Justice—first Mr. Davie Fulton and later Mr. Guy Favreau—a unanimous consensus was reached which became known as the Fulton-Favreau formula. The committee's unanimous recommendations were accepted without alteration by a First Ministers' Conference chaired by Prime Minister Pearson. That Accord was signed by the Government of Canada and not nine but all ten provincial premiers. It was further mutually agreed that the federal government would submit a resolution to Parliament, and the provincial premiers to their respective legislatures, formally ratifying the agreement that had been reached. Regrettably, the Union Nationale Party in Quebec launched a vigorous campaign against the proposal, and the then Quebec premier, Mr. Jean Lesage, reluctantly advised the Prime Minister that his legislature would not ratify the Accord.

The disappointment was great, but the important and significant thing is this: Notwithstanding the disappointment, not one government leader, federal or provincial, argued that the federal government and the other nine provinces should proceed anyway. That was not because Quebec had a veto power, any more than it has such a power today. The matter was not forced because every government leader acknowledged that, by forcing the issue, what the country would gain would be significantly less than what it would risk losing through the strain such an action would put on the ties of Confederation.

Senator Flynn: Right on.

Senator Manning: The same wisdom prevailed when the Victoria Accord broke down in 1971. Where is that wisdom today?

Senator Smith: Gone!

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, it is in the light of all these circumstances and considerations that we must assess, and pass judgment on, the Address that is now before us. This I have endeavoured to do; and, after weighing what will be gained against what may well be lost, I have reached the conclusion that I cannot in good conscience support this constitutional package so long as it contains a Charter which is fundamentally unsound, especially when there exists no set of compelling circumstances making its passage imperative, but there does exist a set of circumstances in which its adoption will pose a grave and unacceptable threat to Canada's future as a nation.

For those reasons, and notwithstanding my satisfaction with the measure of accord that has been reached, for the good of Canada I am compelled to vote against the Address in its present form.

● (2040)

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, it is obvious to us all why the former Premier of Alberta, who served so well in that top job from 1943 to 1968, should be awarded the first and only Order of Excellence of Alberta. He gave us a wonderful exhibition this evening.

Senator Macdonald: Senator Bird is waiting to speak.

Senator Walker: Then, by all means, ladies first.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, in the words of Tom Payne, "These are times that try men's souls." I assure you they also try the souls and minds of women. For over a year now, many of us have been torn and battered by the winds of intense, conflicting emotions; emotions that have, at times, dimmed the light of reason and mature judgment.

Like many other Canadians, I enjoyed a sense of quiet satisfaction, of pride when the Joint Committee on the Constitution presented its report. It had worked long, hard and wisely to hammer out a new Constitution with a truly entrenched Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It produced an enlightened document based on information gained at the hearings that required necessary compromises by the federal government. It was an enlightened document based on a sophisticated, modern concept of equity and justice. It was a triumph of statesmanship over partisan politics.

After the Supreme Court brought down its decision, I wanted the government to take the resolution to Westminster immediately, without trying, once again, to reach a consensus with the provinces. I wanted that for two reasons. First, I was sure that the ten provincial premiers would never reach a consensus that the federal government could possibly accept. After listening to that shameful conference in September 1980, I was convinced that the majority of the provincial premiers were selfish, arrogant and destructive, that they were charting a collision course that would eventually destroy our country.

Senator Flynn: But not the Prime Minister.

Senator Bird: Perhaps, honourable senators, I was too hard on them. I am a federalist. I am convinced of the necessity of having a strong federal presence. I deplore the way the power of Parliament has been whittled away by judgments of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council at Westminster. I believe that, for the good of the country, every effort should be made to prevent further attrition of the power and supremacy of Parliament.

My second reason for wanting immediate referral to London is quite simply that I personally believe that custom and convention should be ignored if they have outlived their usefulness. They are valuable tools for constructive action when they are servants, but they are restrictive tyrants when they are masters. On the other hand, I have always had a profound respect for law because without law and confidence in the integrity of our judicial process we have anarchy.

Therefore, when the Supreme Court ruled that Parliament has the legal right to take the resolution to Westminster, I thought we should not stand upon the order of our going, but go at once. As time went on, I was swayed by a new and different emotion. I was angry when it became apparent that the Parliament at Westminster would probably reject the resolution because it did not conform to its concept of traditional custom and convention. I felt this vestigial form of colonialism was not only ridiculous but also an insult to the Parliament and the people of Canada.

Senator Flynn: Come on.

Senator Bird: Then common sense took over. I realized that the parliamentary system we have adopted from Britain does require that custom and convention be respected. I realized that another last try must be made to find an accord. After that my spirits vacillated between hope and despair. And then, incredulous, I was swept in a moment of euphoria when a sort of political miracle took place, when nine of the provinces and the federal government reached an agreement.

I am sure that the provincial premiers reached the accord because public opinion made them aware that their intransigence was not acceptable.

Senator Smith: That is what you think.

Senator Bird: Yes.

Honourable senators, from the beginning of this exercise in constitution making, reason and common sense told me that we had to compromise, because compromise is necessary in a federal country. Yet, I felt so emotional about the importance of what we were trying to do that I could not endure the thought of having the Charter of Rights gutted for the sake of custom and convention and selfish provincialism.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Olson: Right on.

Senator Flynn: Everybody is selfish but you, I suppose.

Senator Austin: Do you think that you have all the wisdom?

Senator Bird: Thank you, honourable senators.

My euphoria over the Accord did not last very long. From the heights of relief, I was plunged into the Slough of Despondency when I realized what had been done to the Charter. Like thousands of other Canadians, I found it incredible, almost obscene that the equality of women and men and the existing rights of the aboriginal people should have been disregarded in such an insensitive and arbitrary way.

Honourable senators, the place of a woman was certainly in the kitchen and, in the case of the Constitution, in the kitchen of the Convention Centre when Chrétien, Romanow and McMurtry cooked up the constitutional mess of potage that proved to be digestible for nine out of the ten premiers. It was not wholly to the taste of the Prime Minister, since it was he who, for the sake of agreement, was forced to be the most flexible and the most compromising. It was he who made a great personal sacrifice in order to achieve the Accord. Undoubtedly, women and the aboriginal people of this country would have been spared an agonizing experience if the numerical majority of the population had been represented in that kitchen and, more importantly, at the conference table.

The solidarity of Canadian women and their potential power as voters were demonstrated when they were successful in persuading several of the premiers to agree to remove the overrule from section 28 of the Charter. It seems incredible that massive lobbying should have been required to do that. The federal government had, of course, already agreed by their support of the resolution as amended by the joint committee.

I am sure everyone in the chamber is comforted by the knowledge that section 28 is now entrenched. It now protects the numerical male minority of the population as well as the female majority, which is, of course, only right and proper: we should protect our minorities.

[Senator Bird.]

[Translation]

It should be a source of regret for all Canadians that the Premier of the Province of Quebec has decided he will no longer negotiate in good faith.

This attitude is not surprising. Mr. Lévesque is a separatist, and he is not going to change.

I hope and pray that the good sense and goodwill of the people of Quebec will prevail as it did during the referendum.

It should be a tragedy for Quebec and for Canada if Mr. René Lévesque were able to realize his ambition.

I lived for years in "la belle province", and I am very sad when I think about the threat of separatism. Many of my friends live there. Part of my heart is there. My love for Quebec and my love of Canada are intertwined.

I know that many of my dear colleagues share my feelings and that they are torn, because their roots are deeply anchored in the soil of Quebec.

[English]

They have my sympathy and understanding.

Honourable senators, we now have before us a proposed Constitution with a reasonable amending formula, and a semi-entrenched Charter of Rights and Freedoms that should be a binding statement of the beliefs and aspirations of the Canadian people. I am not convinced of the validity of the potential overrules on fundamental and legal rights, in spite of assurances from authorities in the field of civil rights that they may assist in the realization of justice, rather than act as a hindrance. I am glad that the senators who spoke before me today made me feel less badly about this aspect of the matter. It seems to be a very strong body of opinion, and perhaps the Honourable Eugene Forsey, who has made cogent and convincing arguments against them, may not be entirely right, but I cannot help but share some of his apprehension.

● (2050)

Fortunately, this is not a final Constitution. There can be no such thing in a rapidly changing society. It can and must be strengthened and improved in the light of experience, judicial rulings and public demand.

In conclusion, I think that we are duty bound to vote for it now. It would be incredible and improper, an affront to the democratic process of government, if a chamber made up of fewer than a hundred appointed members decided to delay that resolution agreed upon by the elected representatives of the people in the House of Commons and the elected governments of nine of the provinces. Some of us may gag a bit when we say "Aye," but that is what we are compelled to say—compelled by duty and a sense of responsibility.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, with my apologies, now may we get down to a little hard tack? I should like to refer honourable senators to page 4282 of the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of December 1. I am referring particularly to section 38(1), which reads as follows:

An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by

(a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and

(b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces that have, in the aggregate, according to the then latest general census, at least fifty per cent of the population of all the provinces.

Therefore all important legislation dealing with the Constitution of Canada, and amendments to it, must originate with resolutions of both houses and then the concurrence of two-thirds of the provinces having at least half of the population of Canada.

Then we find all the way through here a lot of common sense and a lot of things to congratulate the government on.

Then we come to section 41, which says:

An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

In other words, any amendments to the Constitution in relation to anything as important as the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province must be done in this way; the changing of the number of senators and the number of members of the House of Commons must be done in this way; the use of French or English must be done in this way; and of course, the composition of the Supreme Court itself. Everything throughout here depends on the co-operation of the Senate and the House of Commons. It looks all very well.

Section 42 deals with an amendment to the Constitution in relation to the composition of the House of Commons and the Senate, the method of selecting senators, the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate, and the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada. It is always the Senate and the House of Commons co-operating under this act, as they have done for 100 years, and it should work out well.

The greatest surprise is section 47. It looks as if it is a bad dream that has been pitched in here. That section upsets the whole apple cart, and it looks as if the Prime Minister, or someone acting on his behalf, was angry, because now, after hearing about the correlation of these two great houses, section 47(1) reads as follows:

An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate—

I ask you to think about that. There is no reason for it. It has never happened in our hundred-year history, and I am asking honourable senators, including the whip over there, to pay attention. This is very important to him. I want him to take it in.

Senator Petten: Of course.

Senator Walker: I am glad to hear you say that, because we have come to the strangest part of this whole act, section 47(1).

Now we have proclamations being made at any time, on any subject, without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issuance of such proclamations, whereas all the way through the act, up until now, it is imperative that there be joint resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons.

Section 47(1) reads:

An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again—

For a second time.

—adopts the resolution.

It becomes law without any consideration whatsoever of the Senate.

I have only been a senator for 19 years, but I remember time after time the Senate's amending one bill after another. My friend, the Leader of the Opposition, will recall that not more than twice were our amendments turned down by the other place. We have worked in unison beautifully. If there was any difference of opinion, we got together in our committees and talked to the House of Commons and worked out something which was to the satisfaction of both houses.

We have worked in tandem all the way through, and now we are being invited, under section 47(1), to take the whole thing and throw it overboard. They are saying, "Get tough! Bring up your resolution, in the knowledge that no longer do you need the scrutiny of the Senate, no longer do you need that famous sober second thought, no longer do you need that experience of all the years that most honourable senators have had. Simply wait six months, and then pass it anyway."

My suggestion to you this evening is that because, to date, no one has indicated any reason for the passage of section 47, all we need do, and all I am asking you to do, is to delete section 47. It is thrown in here out of place anyway, and it contradicts the whole purport of this bill. How anyone put this in the first place, I cannot imagine, but there it is, and that is my suggestion to you because it is illegal, it does not make sense and it should be removed. You cannot have the rest of this resolution include section 47. If the matter has to be heard in the Supreme Court, I say with confidence that I think they would find this section ultra vires.

Rather than giving you a big dose of it, read it for yourselves. You are all experienced legislators, and I depend upon your common sense to insist. All we need to do is make this amendment. It only takes five minutes to do it. When the House of Commons sees what a foolish thing has been done by including it, I think the House of Commons will be glad to make the necessary amendment within an hour of receipt of it.

What will happen if it is left in there? Let me preface my remarks by saying that here we have what I think is a wonderful house. I have thought so for all the years I have been here. Having sat in the House of Commons, and in the cabinet for some years under Mr. Diefenbaker, I came over here expecting to see a lot of sleepy old gentlemen. I was, however, very pleasantly surprised. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is the best committee in Canada. There is no doubt about that. The Americans are hearing a great deal about it, for business reasons. It is a wonderful committee, made up, generally speaking, of outstanding members. I am one of the exceptions; I am not as outstanding as most of the others. The House of Commons is delighted to send its problems over to our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, under the chairmanship of the ablest man I have ever met in matters of this kind, Senator Hayden.

● (2100)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: Our National Finance Committee, under my friend Senator Everett, has a pretty terrific reputation also.

All of the committees, except the Transport and Communications Committee, under the chairmanship of Senator Smith, are, you will be glad to know, headed by Liberals.

We deal with the Criminal Code too. The House of Commons will tell you that they could never do it. They would not have the time or the expertise. In the field of constitutional law we do practically the whole thing.

Those are our four main committees, in addition to which there are another 10 or 12, including Senator Croll's. He always has one or another going.

We cannot get along without the Senate, and yet here we are with section 47. Under the provisions of section 47 the House of Commons could, in five minutes, pass an act to get rid of the Senate, and just by waiting six months and having it passed again the Senate could not fight against its becoming law.

Senator Frith: They would need the vote of the provinces, of course.

Senator Walker: Yes. Section 38 provides that they would need the concurrence of two-thirds of the provinces having at least 50 per cent of the population of all the provinces; that is true.

You know, our present Prime Minister could convince anybody about anything.

Senator Doody: Almost anything!

Senator Walker: "Almost" is very well put.

We are a chamber of sober second thought; there is no doubt about that. But what happens if section 47 is enacted? We will, by so doing, make ourselves different from almost every other democracy in the world. Every democratic government has a second chamber—they call it the bicameral system—but we would become a unicameral system. Even New Zealand has a second chamber—I think they were the last to get one—as has almost every democracy in Europe. Why are two chambers necessary? It is because one chamber, working alone, gets too frisky. They try to do stupid things. They need to be brought back into line by a second chamber. That is something that has been proven over and over again.

This is the third bill in which the Prime Minister has tried to get rid of the Senate. He does not say openly that he is trying to do this, but he has made it awfully simple to do so this time. All he has to do is pass an act to abolish the Senate, wait for six months and then make it the law. Why in the name of heaven would he want to do that, when, to my knowledge and throughout the history that I know of the Senate, no veto has ever been imposed? Everything has been worked out by mutual and happy agreement, and we are on the best of terms with the House of Commons—or, at least, I thought so until I read section 47, which I do not think anybody has studied.

Why should Canada be the exception among the democracies of the world, which have found it necessary to have two chambers? There is no reason for that. Certainly, no reason has been given. Nothing in the history of the Senate has been brought forward as a reason for blasting us in this way. No reason has been given to prove that Canada is different from any other democracy. We do know this, however, that where you have a single house running a country a clever man can manipulate it, can become its master and, finally, its dictator. That is one of the weaknesses of the unicameral system.

We tried the idea of a House of the Provinces. That, really, on the face of it, was ridiculous.

Going back into fairly recent history, since the United States had their own Constitution they got along with a house which was chosen by the legislatures, two senators from each state, none of them being elected by the people. The Americans are an honourable race, and they were even more so a hundred years ago, nevertheless, their Senate became the most corrupt political body in the whole world. It was so corrupt that they had to do away with it. Why? Because everybody who was appointed by the legislatures, or by the other members, represented some interest or another, and the only way they could get anything for their own state was to get together with others from other states so that they would have enough votes to get what they wanted. They, in turn, would then go along and help the other fellow. It became, as I say, so corrupt, that I think it was President Taft, in 1913, who created a Senate which was directly elected by the people. This soon became the most powerful elected body in the history of the world. It was fantastically powerful and fantastically successful.

If the Prime Minister were to bring forward a plan to make our Senate an elected body, I would retire from the Senate at once and say, "Go ahead, that's a wonderful idea." He would not do so, however, because the Senate would soon become more powerful than the House of Commons.

[Senator Walker.]

You are all very modest, honourable senators, and you do not think of this, but we have in the Senate today people like Senator Manning, one of five former provincial premiers. We also have something like 20 privy councillors, most of whom have served in a Canadian cabinet. Where else could you get that kind of representation? Another very important characteristic of our Senate is that we have in it people who are very able, and you have to give credit to the Liberals for finding some of the senators they have appointed, not necessarily prominent in the field of finance but prominent in some profession or other, or some trade or other.

Most of us make a point of representing the place we come from. I have quite a job doing that. I am the senator from Toronto. I notice that nobody boos any more when I say that. In the old days, 20 years ago, they used to boo. We are starting to get liked, and recognized, I suppose.

Can I not just appeal to you on this occasion? Please do not put this thing through. Do not whitewash what is so obviously a horrendous black mark, which makes the whole thing seem simply ridiculous.

We are going to hear some good speeches tonight—some further good speeches. I corrected myself because I had to include Senator Manning, who has already made a very good speech.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Walker: I move, seconded by Senator Macquarrie:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981, be amended by deleting therefrom Section 47 and making the appropriate changes by re-numbering the remaining Sections accordingly.

Thank you very much. I would be delighted to answer any questions.

• (2110)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Walker, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981, be amended by deleting therefrom Section 47 and making the appropriate changes by re-numbering the remaining Sections accordingly.

As you know, honourable senators, there is a ruling that, pursuant to the order adopted on December 2, 1981, a record-ed division is deferred.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I will not take much of your time with my remarks on the resolution before us. As a member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, I had the good fortune of being present for much of the constitutional debate. I have also heard and read many excellent speeches made in this house by honourable senators from both sides, and believe that most sections of the resolution have been fully debated.

My remarks will deal with two provisions which are of particular concern to people living north of the 60th parallel:

namely, section 35 which deals with aboriginal rights; and section 42(1)(e) and (f), which deals with "the extension of existing provinces into the territories" and "the establishment of new provinces."

I will deal first with section 35, which concerns aboriginal rights. The joint committee spent many hours hearing evidence from Indian, Inuit and Métis leaders before finally agreeing to enshrine aboriginal rights in the new Constitution. We were told repeatedly by all native groups that aboriginal rights would have to be included in the Constitution before it goes to Westminster. We were told that the premiers would never agree to such a section being added at a later date. The New Democratic Party, in particular, fought on behalf of the native groups to have aboriginal rights entrenched. Mr. Broadbent then threatened to withdraw his support of the resolution unless the Prime Minister went back to the premiers for another round of negotiations. This was done and, lo and behold, the premiers said, "take section 35 out of the package." Who was the most surprised person in Canada when the premiers took that position? Mr. Broadbent, of course. It seems that the Prime Minister was supposed to go back and negotiate, but was not to agree to anything.

It sounds like typical NDP politics to me—an attempt to be everything to all people that ends up being nothing to anyone. It was only a massive pressure campaign by native and non-native groups, including the entire Northwest Territories Legislative Assembly which travelled to Ottawa for a full week, that forced the premiers to backtrack and finally agree to re-insert section 35, with the addition of the word "existing" to "aboriginal and treaty rights." For a party that would like to represent labour unions, which know all about negotiations, the NDP hung themselves out to dry on that move.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: I will now deal with section 42(1), paragraphs (e) and (f). This is a new section added to the resolution as an indication of support from the premiers. At present, exclusive jurisdiction for creating provinces rests with the Parliament of Canada. I am sure that every person living north of the 60th parallel would prefer to have that power remain with Parliament. However, the new section, which is again the result of both opposition parties insisting that the Prime Minister negotiate with the premiers, will now mean that the Yukon and the Northwest Territories cannot become provinces without the concurrence of at least two-thirds of the existing provinces whose total population exceeds 50 per cent of the population of Canada.

That, honourable senators, is a serious, if not tragic, blow to the political aspirations of all northerners. Both territories have made significant progress towards responsible government in recent years and were surely hoping to continue that trend. Unfortunately, section 42 will make provincial status for either territory virtually impossible in the foreseeable future.

Let me make it clear that I, personally, am not in favour of provincial status for the Yukon at this time. Having said that, I believe provincial status for both territories is not a matter of

"if", but a matter of "when". My fear now is that this new section takes the decision away from Parliament and the people of the two territories, where it belongs, and makes us pawns of the existing provinces.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, some members of the Conservative Party would have us believe that "those bad Liberals" have sold the two territories down the river with this new section. They say that the Prime Minister "bartered away the rights of Yukoners." They suggest that they made a valiant effort to rescue the north from "those bad premiers" by moving an amendment to have paragraphs (e) and (f) deleted from section 42, because they do not agree with the intent of those paragraphs.

Honourable senators, I will conclude my remarks by quoting from the Debates of the Senate of October 16, 1979, at page 64. At that time the Conservative Party formed the government. The Right Honourable Joe Clark was Prime Minister and Senator Flynn was the Minister of Justice.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: That was a portfolio, I might add, that I thought he handled quite well. The question, which I asked, was:

Honourable senators, I have some questions for the Leader of the Government. My questions to the Leader of the Government last week concerning his government's policy on responsible government in the Yukon were not fully answered. If the people of the Yukon have a referendum and vote for provincial status, will agreement be required from the provinces before provincial status is granted?

I want it clearly understood that my question concerns agreement of the provinces, not consultation with them. Will the agreement of the ten provinces be required before provincial status is granted to the Yukon?

The answer from Senator Flynn, taken from the Debates of the Senate of October 30, 1979, at page 209, was as follows:

Honourable senators, I have some replies to questions asked previously.

On Tuesday, October 16, Senator Lucier asked a question regarding the granting of responsible government to the Yukon. In reply I have sought a complete legal opinion from my officials.

Senator Flynn: It was a legal opinion; what is wrong with that?

Senator Lucier: Senator Flynn, I am not finished. I am simply quoting your words:

On a policy matter, the Prime Minister has said repeatedly that if the people, subsequent to full consultations, demonstrate in a referendum their wish to gain full provincial status, and if the provinces agree, then, subject to legislation being passed by the Parliament of Canada, the Yukon would become a full province.

[Senator Lucier.]

That, honourable senators, is and was the position of the Conservative Party when it formed the Government of Canada.

Senator Flynn: I say that it is a legal opinion.

Senator Lucier: The honourable member from the Yukon was a cabinet minister. I think it is time the people of northern Canada know exactly where both opposition parties stand on these two important sections.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: It's a good thing they knew where the Grits stood, too!

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, this is not a perfect document. We knew when we started that it was not going to be a perfect document. It has some flaws in it.

Honourable senators, my intention is to vote for this resolution. I am very proud, as a Yukoner, to vote for it, to support its going to Westminster, and to stay here in an effort to help improve it in the years to come.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I would like some clarification from Senator Lucier. On the one hand, he criticizes me for the legal opinion that I gave two years ago, yet, on the other hand, apparently, he is satisfied that this legal opinion be entrenched in the Constitution because he does not move an amendment.

● (2120)

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I did not criticize Senator Flynn. What I quoted was not a legal opinion, since the legal opinion was more involved. I wanted everyone to understand—and Senator Flynn has given me an opportunity to stress my point—that this is a matter of policy. The Prime Minister has said repeatedly that if the people, subsequent to full consultation, demonstrate in a referendum their wish to gain full provincial status, and if the provinces agree, then, subject to legislation being passed by the Parliament of Canada, the Yukon will become a full province. Prime Minister Clark made those statements.

Senator Flynn: I am saying that this opinion, whether it is an opinion of policy or a legal opinion, is now inscribed in the Constitution. Apparently you are happy with that situation, so why do you cry? You do not know what you want.

Senator Lucier: My whole speech indicates that I am not happy with it.

Senator Flynn: But you will vote for it just the same, as usual.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, when you come from the north, you learn to survive. If you are swimming in a very fast river, you swim downstream, not upstream.

Senator Flynn: You do not swim both ways at once.

Senator Lucier: You would never survive by doing that.

Senator Austin: May I pose a question to Senator Lucier? I too was a member of the joint committee. Is it the honourable senator's view that the Progressive Conservative Party members in the joint committee supported the Vancouver formula? Further, is it his view that the Vancouver formula supported provisions allowing the extension of provincial status to the two northern territories, with this decision requiring the consent of the provinces? If those provisions were contained in the Victoria formula, Senator Flynn was merely carrying forward the Conservative support of the Vancouver formula.

Senator Doody: An excellent speech.

Senator Flynn: Even if he does not know, he is going to say "yes."

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I did not participate in the debate on the earlier resolution, but I listened to most of the speeches and, during the summer recess, read them all. I must say that I was pleasantly impressed with the responsible attitude taken by almost all senators in that debate. I want to refer very briefly to some of those speeches, not because I do not realize that the former resolution is now functus, but because some of the arguments put forward are relevant to the views that I have reached in relation to the resolution presently before us which was moved this day.

I listened with interest to Senator Lamontagne's speech and the argument that he made about the fact that the Government of Canada was not legally obliged to consult the provinces before passing a joint resolution to go on to Westminster. This view, of course, was upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada. Senator Lamontagne also held the view that there was no constitutional convention requiring the concurrence of the provinces before the passing of the joint resolution. In this regard, of course, six of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada differed from him and held that there was such a constitutional convention, even though there was not a legally-binding obligation.

Finally, Senator Lamontagne made a good argument that there was a convention that the Parliament at Westminster always acts upon the joint address of the two houses.

For the most part, I think I would agree with Senator Lamontagne. Quite frankly, I was a little surprised that the Supreme Court of Canada, by a majority, held that there was a constitutional convention requiring consultation with the provinces. In any event, Senator Lamontagne's analysis of the procedural situation has turned out to be almost completely right.

The speech that then impressed me the most was that of Senator Thompson. He put forward excellent arguments concerning the procedures to be followed, and he quoted the many precedents for provincial agreements, starting with the views of Sir Ivor Jennings and quoting Canadian Prime Ministers from Sir John A. Macdonald down to—and one might even say "especially"—Prime Minister Trudeau.

Senator Thompson thought that Parliament could not, should not, or would not act in a matter relating to the legislative competence of the provinces without consultation with and the agreement of those provinces.

He also put forward an excellent argument concerning the entrenchment of the Charter of Rights and, following the reference to Professor Browne by Senator Cook, Senator Thompson elaborated on Professor Browne's views on the dangers of entrenching a Bill of Rights in the Constitution. I need not refer to Professor Browne's views, with which I generally agree, because this has already been done by previous speakers and is part of the record of this chamber. However, I will refer to Professor Browne a little later on.

Senator Godfrey treated us to a very interesting speech, but his rather inelegant ending, saying that he would "hold his nose and vote for the resolution," seemed to me to be a complete non sequitur to the arguments that he had made.

I also listened with interest to Senator McIlraith who again quoted a long series of precedents and statements of Canadian Prime Ministers and Ministers of Justice concerning the necessity of acting in concert with the provinces, particularly where provincial legislative jurisdiction was concerned.

Senator Manning's arguments against entrenching the Charter of Rights also appealed to me, but not his arguments against the amending formula. I felt that his views concerning an amending formula would have made it too rigid and too difficult. We again heard from Senator Manning this evening so I need not make any further reference to his views.

The last speech to which I wish to refer is that of Senator Lang. He, again, developed the argument about the non-entrenchment of the Charter of Rights. He particularly developed the very interesting argument having to do with the Colonial Laws Validity Act, the Statute of Westminster, especially section 7(1) and item 17 of Schedule I of this resolution. Of course, his points have not been answered by the resolution now before us.

The difference, I suppose, is that whereas the previous resolution was opposed by eight out of ten provinces and, therefore, was very likely to be challenged along the lines envisaged by Senator Lang, the present resolution is supported by nine of the ten provinces and may not be so apt to be challenged in the courts, as was suggested by Senator Lang, or in any other way.

Honourable senators, from what I have said and from the speeches to which I have referred, you will see that I had reached the conclusion that I could not, in good conscience, have voted for the previous resolution. My reasoning for that had to do with three things: First, my conviction as a common law lawyer that the entrenchment of the Bill of Rights was not a helpful thing and might even prove to be harmful so far as our Constitution is concerned; second, I was opposed to the resort to a referendum; and, third, I was deeply concerned that, no matter how intransigent and unreasonable some of them had been, the resolution was, in fact, opposed by the government spokesmen of eight out of ten Canadian provinces. While I believe that some of the reasons for their opposition to this were bad and I do not think that they tried hard enough to reach an agreement, until they eventually did at the eleventh hour, I felt that it was a very serious matter for us to ask Westminster to pass legislation having to do with the legislative competence of the provinces when it was opposed by eight of ten provinces.

As you can see, the resolution now before us satisfies me insofar as the removal of the resort to a referendum and insofar as the support of provincial governments are concerned since we now have the agreement of nine out of ten provinces.

However, I do wish to record my concern in relation to the position of the Province of Quebec, and I share a good many of the views enunciated by Senator Manning this evening. But I would not go so far, on that count alone, as to vote against the resolution.

● (2130)

So, how then do I deal with the Charter of Rights? I have said that my view, as a common law lawyer, was that I was not very enthusiastic about an entrenched Bill of Rights; but initially I felt that this was not all that serious, that while it did not appeal to me, it would not, in my view, have done very much good to the rights and freedoms of Canadians, but it would not have done very much harm either.

It was the papers of Professor Browne that convinced me that the entrenchment of a Bill of Rights, as was done under the previous resolution, had positively harmful connotations. I will not go through the arguments, which relate, of course, to the transfer of ultimate power from the elected representatives of the people—that is, members of Parliament and members of the provincial legislatures—to tenured judges of the Supreme Court; but that did come as a matter of great concern to me.

Nevertheless, my chief concern with the Bill of Rights was the fact that it constituted an encroachment on provincial legislative powers without the consent of the provinces, save only, under the old resolution, Ontario and New Brunswick. I believe firmly that the final authority should be Parliament and the provincial legislatures, rather than the courts.

However, this situation has been considerably improved by section 33 and the “notwithstanding” clauses, and far from viewing the “notwithstanding” clauses with disapproval, I believe they have done a fair amount to restore the balance of ultimate authority to the provincial legislatures and the Parliament of Canada rather than giving it to the Supreme Court; albeit the process will be somewhat less direct than it would have been had we not entrenched a Charter of Rights at all.

So, therefore, I have read with interest Professor Browne’s paper of last October 20, and I will read into the record two paragraphs which seem to me to express very well both his views and my own. He said:

The essential question at present is not whether we should have a Charter of Rights. It is whether this Charter should be “entrenched”—or rather (since there are other forms of entrenchment possible, whether it should be entrenched in the manner proposed by the federal government. In short, we have to decide whether the rights and freedoms listed in the Charter should be ultimately interpreted by the federal and provincial parliaments or by the Supreme Court.

[Senator Hicks.]

Skipping a few lines, he continues:

Judges are not necessarily the best interpreters of a Charter of Rights. They can make invaluable contributions when considering it, and the role of the Supreme Court of Canada, in this regard, might well be enhanced. But to judge by the record, not just of our own courts but of those in other countries (including the United States), it is at least debatable whether minority rights and freedoms—let alone social ideals and programs—are better protected, or promoted, by appointed and tenured judges than by elected and responsible legislators.

In the final paragraph of his paper he says:

Passage of the federal government’s proposal is not bound, or likely, to end the constitutional wrangling. Simple patriation with an amending formula—either through the passage of another British statute to replace the British North America Act or by means of a British statute repealing Section 7 of the Statute of Westminster—should, if accompanied by an amending provision or agreement, enable our politicians to concentrate, for a while, on other matters. Necessary constitutional reforms could then be made in the way in which we have usually, and not all that unsuccessfully, made them—gradually, cooperatively and, above all, pragmatically. On the other hand, the revolutionary alteration of our parliamentary system and federal structure that would result from the entrenchment of the federal government’s Charter of Rights would almost certainly require additional and imminent, as well as more radical and contentious, changes. And so many individuals, groups and governments would be left so dissatisfied, disgruntled and disunited that Canadians could face an even more serious constitutional crisis before long.

Those represented Professor G. P. Browne’s views as of October 20, and I was pleased to find, after the “notwithstanding” clauses had been put into the present resolution, that he wrote another paper on November 18, after the Accord had been reached with nine of the ten provinces, and declared himself virtually completely satisfied that the balance had been restored and that the “notwithstanding” clauses made the entrenchment of the Charter of Rights much more acceptable than he had thought only a month before. I adopt his reasoning in that respect and, therefore, I believe that I can accept the Charter of Rights in the Constitution in its present form, with the “notwithstanding” clauses, and that I can support the resolution.

I should now like to comment briefly on two or three other sections of the resolution before us. It is rather intriguing to read section 3, which says:

Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein.

It does not refer to any age limitation, and the only way that one can get any age limitation is to go back to section 1, which says:

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

From that one could argue, I suppose, that the Parliament of Canada can fix the voting age of the Canadian citizen, or that the Parliament or the legislature of a province can fix the voting age of Canadian citizens in that province. But it seems to me that we still have the possibility here of a good deal of litigation. Suppose, for example, as, indeed, is the case, that Province A has a voting age of 19 and Province B has a voting age of 21; and suppose that I am a 20-year old in Province B. I believe I could read section 3 of the Charter of Rights and say that my fundamental rights are being interfered with because I am not allowed to vote in Province B, whereas if I were living in Province A I would be allowed to vote. In any event, I think that is intriguing. I hope it will not cause a lot of litigation, but I can see the possibility of its doing so.

Senator Walker referred to section 47, and, of course, I had noticed that section 47 would almost certainly make it possible to abolish the Senate without the consent of the Senate, provided there was the consent of seven provinces containing 50 per cent or more of the population of Canada and there were two resolutions passed by the House of Commons.

I do not believe that the Senate needs an absolute veto, in any event. I believe a suspensive veto would serve our purposes well enough. But, strangely enough, it seems to me that this is topsy-turvy. If there is one area where the Senate ought to have an absolute veto, it would be in matters having to do with such fundamental items as our Constitution, and so on.

I know that one makes oneself subject to the suspicion that one is merely trying to protect one's own place in the Senate with this, but I deny that, and I state categorically that if it were shown to me, by a resolution of the House of Commons and by the concurrence of seven of Canada's ten provinces containing more than half the country's population, I do not believe that I would want to sit here in the Senate and try to perpetuate the chamber, in any event. Surely it is up to us, honourable senators, to try even harder than we have before—and everyone knows that our public relations have not always been as good as they should be—to make other legislators understand, and to make the people of Canada understand, the validity of the function of the Senate and the important role that it does play, and the even more important role that it could play, if it were given the opportunity to do so, in the legislative process and the government of Canada; and I join with the remarks of Senator Walker in this respect.

Finally, I am a little unhappy about the provision of section 59, which says, in effect, that section 23(1)(a), having to do with language rights, shall come into force in Quebec only on proclamation, with the approval of the Legislature of Quebec. It may say "the legislature or government of Quebec." Perhaps I had better look at it so that we can have the record right.

● (2140)

Section 59 states:

(1) Paragraph 23(1)(a) shall come into force in respect of Quebec on a day to be fixed by proclamation issued by the Queen or the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada.

(2) A proclamation under subsection (1) shall be issued only where authorized by the legislative assembly or government of Quebec.

It seems to me that that gives an undue, arbitrary authority to one province which is not accorded to other provinces in Canada. Perhaps, however, in view of the special circumstances relating to the province of Quebec, I can swallow my reservations about this proposal.

I think that is all that it is necessary for me to say, honourable senators. I am not as ecstatic about this constitutional document as some honourable senators, but perhaps it is the best that we can do at this time. It does have the support of all but one government and legislature in Canada. Accordingly, I support the motion and the resolution.

On motion of Senator Robichaud, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

THE SENATE

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FLYNN

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a matter of personal privilege. I was watching television last evening and the Leader of the Government appeared on the screen angrily accusing me of having broken an agreement. I do not know what he was referring to because I do not know of any agreement that I have broken. Therefore, I would ask him to withdraw that accusation.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the comments made on television yesterday by me and by the Leader of the Opposition, certainly in my case, appeared only in brief, edited and excerpted form. If the Leader of the Opposition is willing to bring to me a transcript of my complete remarks, I will be glad to discuss with him the contents of that entire interview. Similarly, I hope that he will be willing to produce the complete text of the remarks and comments made by him to the media yesterday relating to the government and its constitutional proposals.

For my part, I referred to an informal understanding.

Honourable senators, I think that the agreement achieved subsequently last night was beneficial to the Senate and the country, and I do not wish to attribute any unworthy motives at all to the Leader of the Opposition. The understanding that we had was that the debate would commence yesterday and that a number of speakers from both parties were to participate in that debate. That is the understanding I had in mind.

Senator Flynn: It was not broken.

Senator Perrault: If what I have said serves to clarify the situation for the Leader of the Opposition, I am pleased to have given that explanation.

Senator Flynn: I have not broken any agreement. We proceeded as we had agreed to proceed.

I am not sure whether the Leader of the Government was referring to our motion for postponement. If that is what he had in mind, there was no agreement not to move such a motion. Of course, it was obvious that if I were to do that, it would succeed only with the concurrence of the government. So I take the remarks of the Leader of the Government as a withdrawal of his accusation.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course, what I have said does not constitute a withdrawal. It constitutes, however, an explanation, and similarly I am pleased to have the explanation offered by the Leader of the Opposition of the position he took yesterday.

Senator Flynn: I will still not accept anything but a withdrawal of the accusation. I do not consider it fair. I have not made any reference to the Leader of the Government personally, either during this debate or over television, and therefore I do not accept his hesitation—

Senator Perrault: If the Leader of the Opposition holds the view that he was affronted by that brief excerpted comment, which represented only a small part of the total interview given to the CBC, at its request, then, of course, I wish to make it clear to this chamber that no offence to the Leader of the Opposition was meant. I did, however, give my interpretation of what I had assumed to be an informal agreement we had with the opposition. But, as I have said, subsequent events yesterday have served to establish a course for the debate which I believe is satisfactory to all honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: Let the record speak for itself.

THE SENATE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a further matter of privilege to raise, and it concerns not only myself but the whole Senate. Yesterday the Prime Minister, in a press conference, said that today he would be telephoning Mrs. Thatcher, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, to make arrangements for the quick passage of the Constitution resolution now before the Senate. I consider that to be an affront to the Senate, because the Prime Minister assumed—and possibly he is right—that the Senate is only a rubber stamp.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret the testy mood of the Leader of the Opposition this morning. The Prime Minister has been in continuing communication with Mrs. Thatcher. I presume that his next conversation with her will suggest the possibility of the Senate's disposing of this matter—

Senator Flynn: Yesterday it was not a possibility.

Senator Perrault: —along the lines of the agreement, which indeed was seconded by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday—an agreement to have the vote put at 5 p.m. on Tuesday afternoon. There are many other matters which the Prime Minister may wish to discuss with the Prime Minister of Great Britain. The conversation may well not be restricted to the important Constitution considerations.

Senator Flynn: May I draw the attention of the Leader of the Government to the fact that the agreement to have the vote at 5 p.m. on Tuesday was reached only at the end of the afternoon, and after the Prime Minister's press conference. Therefore, he could not base his comments on this agreement.

● (1005)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, obviously the comment is unfair. This must be the view of most members of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Which comment? The one by the Prime Minister?

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition does not have a text of the comments attributed to the Prime Minister yesterday, who, I understand, gave a far-ranging press conference relating not only to constitutional matters but to economic questions, and questions relating to his future in public life. Certainly, the comments made by him on that occasion did not attempt to anticipate any action which may or may not take place in the chamber.

Senator Flynn: I do not see why the Leader of the Government thinks he has to defend the Prime Minister the way he does. He accused me yesterday of trying to win Brownie points with Mr. Lévesque. What is he trying to do now—win Brownie points with the Prime Minister?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, when I was a young lawyer I read a book by a very famous New York lawyer called Louis Nizer, who advised all lawyers to operate under the law of probabilities. I have done that in my law practice, and I think it is perfectly legitimate for the Prime Minister to do it too.

ENERGY

RIDLEY ISLAND COAL PORT RATES AGREEMENT— ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am pleased to announce that an agreement has been reached with Teck Corporation and Quintette Coal Limited on the rates that will apply for shipment of coal through a new coal terminal facility under construction at Ridley Island involving an investment of $275 million.

The agreement achieved late last night marks the successful conclusion of a lengthy series of intensive and complex negotiations that required the combined efforts of all the parties involved in the development of this massive resource project which will have an overall cost of $2.25 billion. Full development of the northeastern British Columbia coal block will yield substantial economic benefits for British Columbia and, indeed, for all of Canada.

My colleagues and I are confident that the NHB/FEDCOM Corporation offered the best possible rate post-1989 to the two coal producers while still adhering to fundamental objectives of the federal government that the port operate on a commercial basis after April 1989, and that the competitive position of southern British Columbia and other western coal producers not be jeopardized.

We are particularly pleased that the new NHB/FEDCOM Corporation was able to move so quickly to resolve the rate issue, thus ensuring timely development of the port to meet the coal producers' shipping schedule, and, in particular, the British Columbia government's commitments for some of the necessary rail infrastructure.

The federal government's participation in the project through sound capital investment for associated rail and port development reflects the high priority the national government attaches to facilitating major resource development opportunities in Canada's regions that are of significant economic benefit to the country and beyond the capacity of a provincial government or the private sector alone.

The federal government is providing assistance in several ways, including the creation of the new NHB/FEDCOM Corporation for the construction, design and operation of the port, a guaranteed developmental rate until 1989, site clearing, access and preparation for the port and approximately $275 million through Canadian National Railways for line improvements and rail equipment purchases.

This project has required, and will continue to require, the joint planning and co-operation of the federal and British Columbia governments and the coal producers. The federal-provincial co-operation that we have sustained throughout these extremely complex negotiations has enabled us to seize a key economic opportunity for British Columbians and all Canadians.

● (1010)

Honourable senators, in conclusion, I would like to say that Senator Perrault, for the past 18 months, has been deeply involved in these complex negotiations. Senator Austin, since he joined the cabinet only recently, has also made a major contribution to the very satisfactory result that I am able to announce today.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if my honourable friend, when he considers making such a statement, would do the members of this chamber the courtesy of letting us have a copy of it. How on earth are we expected to comment, either appreciatively or otherwise, when we do not know the content of the statement beforehand?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The ink has not yet dried on the release.

Senator Roblin: In that case, perhaps you could wait until we have at least had a chance to look at it. I have just been handed by my colleague, the Leader of the Opposition, a press release. We know what those are, so I pay no attention to that. I would, however, appreciate it if my honourable friend would let me have a copy of his statement.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think that is an unfair comment. This occurred, I believe, at some time around 1 o'clock this morning. The people of this country and, more particularly, the people on the west coast and those in north-eastern British Columbia, are entitled, in my view, to have a press release issued and communicated to them as soon as is possible. That was done. A copy of that release, containing all of the essential information that my honourable friend needs to know, was handed to him several minutes before 10 o'clock this morning. He cannot, therefore, deny that it was sent to him, or, at least, that it was sent to the office of the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): This thing?

Senator Olson: We have so many good things to announce today that perhaps my honourable friends opposite are confused. There is another statement that Senator Austin will be making in a few moments with respect to the native economic involvement.

Senator Flynn: I did not receive that.

Senator Olson: If my honourable friends are telling me that they did not receive a copy of the press release before they entered the chamber this morning, I apologize to them. I gave instructions to my staff to take it over to the office of the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Well, I did not receive it.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend has certainly clarified a conundrum as far as I was concerned because, while my colleague was speaking on the question of privilege, he was handed this statement. It is, apparently, the one that Senator Austin is to favour us with in a few moments. I thank Senator Austin for his agility in getting his statement to us in time. However, I have to tell my honourable friend, the Minister of State for Economic Development, that I have received no copy of his statement. If he had an opportunity to have it typed so that he could read it to us now, surely he could have passed a copy across the chamber. I ask for no more than that.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if there has been a problem with respect to passing this information on to my honourable friends opposite prior to 10 o'clock this morning, I apologize. I try to make a practice of supplying them with information.

I have a copy in my hand that I will send across to Senator Roblin, if he has not yet received one. I was completely under the impression that it was delivered to him at about 10 minutes to 10 this morning.

Perhaps, honourable senators, if it is acceptable, we could allow Senator Roblin, and anyone else who wishes to comment on it, a few minutes to peruse the document. I have another important piece of information concerning economic development that I should like to give to the Senate at this time.

Senator Flynn: Does it have to do with this release?

Senator Olson: No, it does not.

Senator Roblin: Is it another release?

Senator Olson: Yes.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Roblin: Perhaps you could let us have a copy of that one.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps I should ask whether the office of the Leader of the Opposition, a few minutes before 10 o'clock this morning, received a statement of information respecting a major petrochemical development in Alberta?

NORTH-EAST BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL PROJECT—NATIVE PLANNING PROGRAM—ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, as Senator Roblin has referred to a statement that I delivered to Senator Flynn a few minutes ago—it having just before been put into my hands in final form—perhaps I could proceed to give the information to this chamber with respect to the native planning program of the north-east British Columbia coal project.

I should like to announce that, consequent upon the decision to proceed with the coal port which Senator Olson has just disclosed to the Senate, the Government of Canada is immediately proceeding with a $255,000 federal program to assist native people in northern British Columbia to organize and plan for their involvement in this north-east British Columbia coal project.

● (1015)

The Department of Indian Affairs is providing $60,000; Senator Olson's Ministry of State for Economic Development is contributing $195,000.

Our simple purpose, honourable senators, is to help those native people who will be affected by the north-east British Columbia coal project to identify with, and proceed to secure lasting benefits of a social and economic kind from it. Under the federal and provincial departments of government directly associated with the project, information workshops were held throughout the summer in Prince George, Dawson Creek and Prince Rupert, and many consultations have gone on with native peoples. On the basis of proposals received, we have now agreed to go ahead and fund projects that we think will be beneficial.

I should also like to advise the Senate that in the following fiscal year an enhanced program will be developed, negotiated and, I hope, announced to provide a more definitive kind of participation for native peoples.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear. Where is the enthusiasm on the other side?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We are all for it. If it is good, we are for it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We may not have made any comment, but we are still reading the information.

AGREEMENT RESPECTING SALE OF PETROCHEMICALS—ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, at 9 o'clock last night an announcement was made in Calgary which I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate. It concerns a major petrochemical deal worth approximately $2½ billion.

An agreement has been reached between Canadian-based Enesco, and Union Carbide of New York, for the sale of polyethylene resin. That sale is important for a number of reasons. First, it enhances the development of a world-scale petrochemical industry in Alberta, which is extremely valuable to Alberta and to the whole Canadian economy.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Second, this is another forward step in upgrading our natural resources, in this case natural gas.

Third, it is a good example of the co-operation between the United States and Canadian industry in marketing petrochemicals.

Fourth, the $2½ billion value of this agreement will make a significant contribution to Canada's balance of payments. It is also significant in that this agreement is one of the largest international transactions ever to have taken place in the petrochemical industry.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I congratulate Enesco for building a new polyethylene plant at Joffre, Alberta. That plant represents another component of the Alberta petrochemical industry. It also increases the amount of new investment to $1.14 billion in petrochemical plants in the Red Deer area of Alberta.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On that matter I have just a few questions. First, what is the involvement of the Canadian government in this endeavour? Second, am I correct in thinking that Union Carbide of New York is a U.S.-controlled company? Third, what will be the share of that company in the project? Finally, if it is a U.S. company, has FIRA indicated its approval?

Senator Olson: First of all, honourable senators, there is no direct investment by the Government of Canada in this enormous, massive public undertaking. And I don't think that should be criticized.

Senator Flynn: No, no; we are not criticizing that.

Senator Olson: I think that is an attribute.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: In the second place, Union Carbide is not involved as a company doing the processing or the selling in Canada. Union Carbide is the customer for the $2½ billion of polyethylene resin.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Will my honourable friend tell me what his guidelines are in making these announcements? Here we have an announcement made in respect of a highly substantial and valuable business deal. We usually read about such announcements in the business pages of the Globe and Mail.

● (1020)

Senator Olson: And you will.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend tell me how far down the scale he intends to go in making his announcements in the house?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I find that to be one of the most unusual comments that I have ever heard. Here we are talking about a massive new petrochemical and economic development project in this country which will have economic fall-out benefits throughout the country from the supplies and machinery needed for the project. If my honourable friend is trying to tell me that he does not want to hear such announcements in the Senate, because they happen to be good news then I can understand, but that attitude will not prevent my bringing good news to this chamber once in a while to offset the gloom and doom that comes from the other side most of the time.

Senator Roblin: I would be happy if my honourable friend would bring us good news like this every day.

Senator Olson: There will be more next week.

Senator Roblin: I am simply saying that when we try to get some information from the honourable senator about what is happening to the enterprise system of this country because of the budget which has been produced, he does not seem to have any good answers. However, when he is talking about what enterprise is doing, he is quite forthcoming in his comments. I dare say that the Government of Alberta has something to do with this development as well. I invite my honourable friend to make as many announcements as he likes, but I want to know where his point of cut-off is.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think my honourable friend is really not serious in asking his question with regard to the guidelines, but I think that he would like to be informed as soon as possible, either in this chamber or elsewhere, of major, new, good economic development news, and that is exactly what I have done this morning.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, it seems that my honourable friend likes to bask in the reflected glory of something done by somebody else.

Senator Perrault: Come on now.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator may call it that if he likes, but I like to bask in the glory of good, economic development news from wherever it comes in Canada.

Senator Perrault: It is a vote of confidence in the Canadian economy.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the minister in making the announcement left me with the impression that this development was a decision of the government, and that the government was taking the credit for it.

Senator Roblin: That's right; they are trying to take credit for it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think that Senator Flynn, in all fairness, should go back and read the copy of the document which I just handed to him. It says, in part, that I wish to inform honourable senators of a major deal that has been consummated between Canadian-based Enesco and Union Carbide. I did not say one word about the government.

Senator Flynn: You should have made it clear that the government was not claiming credit for the project.

Senator Olson: I think such developments dispel some of the criticism which comes from those on the opposition benches, that the climate in Canada is not right for business investment. I am simply demonstrating with pragmatic, specific projects that there are enormous investments being made in this country, such as was outlined in our economic development strategy paper which was filed along with the budget. I can tell my honourable friends opposite that I expect to be able to make more announcements of this kind to illustrate that investment does exist in this country, although the projects may not be of this scale.

Senator Flynn: In any event, honourable senators, I am very happy to give credit to the minister for his apparent victory over the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Gray. He seems to be winning his battle.

Senator Perrault: You are in a testy mood today.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I did not receive a copy of the press release, and I missed the exact figures. I wonder if the minister could give us again the amounts of investment and business generated?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall be glad to do that, but if these amounts bother my honourable friends opposite, I would like them to know that they do not result from a decision of the federal government, nor do they involve a major investment by the federal government.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is simply good news about the economy. If there is bad news of any kind, we sure hear about it. You don't seem to mind trying to bask us in the bad news, but don't like us to bask in the good news.

Senator Olson: The investment involved in constructing a new ethylene plant at Joffre, Alberta by Alberta Gas Ethylene Company Ltd. is estimated to be $590 million.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Nova Corporation, of Calgary, and Shell Canada Limited, of Toronto, have announced that they will build a new plant at Joffre costing $250 million. The plant will produce approximately 310,000 tonnes of polyethylene a year.

● (1025)

There will be an additional investment of $300 million by Union Carbide Canada Limited of Toronto that will produce about 264,500 tonnes of ethylene glycol annually at a place called Prentiss.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Would the minister advise this chamber if these developments were made possible by income tax incentives, either specific or general, by the federal government?

Senator Perrault: An excellent question.

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice. I do not think there are any specific tax incentives in place in this regard, but at this time I do not want to categorically say that there are none since I will first check the situation.

Senator Perrault: There very probably are.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Would the Minister of State for Economic Development advise this chamber if the Alberta government has assisted by way of loans, or in relation to the infrastructure?

Senator Olson: I would advise honourable senators that I was invited to attend a celebration in Calgary last night when this announcement was made. The Honourable Hugh Planche, the Minister of Economic Development for Alberta, was in attendance. However, I am sure that all honourable senators realize that circumstances required me to cancel my plan to participate in the ceremony pertaining to the announcement.

I am sure the Government of Alberta was involved in several respects. Of course, there is no question that it would have made the allocation of the natural resources that form the feedstock for these plants. There is no doubt that the Government of Alberta has been helpful in promoting this economic development in some other aspects as well.

I will take as notice the question of whether the Government of Alberta, in any form, was involved in this investment. At the moment, I do not believe that is the case, but I am not entirely sure of that.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Still on the subject of investments, would the Minister of State for Economic Development furnish us with a report on the status of the Alsands project that has been stalled for the last few years because of government policies? This is not a $2½ billion investment, but a $17 billion to $20 billion investment.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, at this time I cannot give a detailed report on the status of that project, nor can I say when all the parties involved will reach an agreement. However, I can advise my honourable friend that some optimistic comments have been made by those involved in the negotiations which would lead me to believe that good, or, at least, satisfactory, progress is being made towards a consummation of that agreement.

Senator Perrault: There is nothing but good news this morning.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

MODIFICATION OF PROVISIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will give one of the ministers opposite an opportunity to give us some more good news. I have been informed that a Liberal Party caucus of the House of Commons took place yesterday attended by the Minister of Finance, and after that caucus, the Minister of Finance made a statement on television to the effect that we might expect further changes of a transitional nature in his budget.

We are getting quite used to changes in the budget, and most of them seem to be an improvement over the original document. I would ask the Leader of the Government when he expects the Minister of Finance to make a statement as to what these further changes will be.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance has always demonstrated a willingness to modify and to improve budget provisions of importance to Canadians.

Again, in the proposed budget, certain modifications have been made. As an example, honourable senators are aware that the effective date of November 12 regarding certain MURB provisions has been changed to December 31. Other modifications are being considered. The practice is not unusual in government, as Senator Roblin is aware. Modifications are made from time to time in certain budget proposals. Indeed, it is a sign of good government that this be the case, and that most governments do not adopt inflexible attitudes with respect to budget matters.

● (1030)

As yet, the Minister of Finance has not established a time when additional modifications may be made, but he has made reference to certain possible changes in the transitional aspects of certain budget measures. The details will be made known at the appropriate time.

Senator Roblin: I commend my honourable friend for acting as quickly as he could to remedy his mistakes in the budget. I suggest that he should do so with all convenient speed. It has not only been one change that he mentioned, but there has also been the Dome Petroleum change which affects a considerable area of the business community. There has also been the deplorable change in the error of arithmetic, in respect of provincial losses under this budget, of some $700 million.

The point I want to stress to my honourable friend is the fact that there are many, many thousands of Canadians whose plans for their economic affairs are affected by this budget. There are the people who are wondering what to do about interest expense, and whether it is really the intention to throw that monkey-wrench into the capital-gathering enterprise system of our country, or whether the government is going to see the error of its ways and do something about it. There are the people who are concerned about their RRSPs, particularly in small business. There is the whole small business area that has been shafted, if any area has been shafted by the so-called loophole-stopping operation that the government has been conducting.

All these people are waiting in suspense because the Minister of Finance has said there are going to be some changes. Well, for heaven's sake, could he let us know what those changes are as soon as he can? I urge my honourable friend and ask him whether he will carry those representations to the Minister of Finance and get him to do something about it, quickly.

Senator Perrault: The Minister of Finance and members of the government are aware of the importance of early action in certain areas, and are also aware of the fact that December 31 is not far away. It can be expected that certain budget modifications may be announced shortly by the Minister of Finance.

May I say in a general way, that the announcements made a short time ago by our colleague, Senator Olson, today represent an enormous amount of effective work on his part. Senator Olson has played a key role in making possible the beneficial coal deal in northeastern British Columbia, as well as development in Alberta. He has been a great and constructive factor in making possible the announcements which were made today. All of these projects represent a substantial vote of confidence in the Canadian economy and in the future of this nation.

Probably the most tangible testimony to the fact that business has a great deal of confidence in the Canadian economy and in this nation today can be found in the announcements made by Senator Olson. People and corporations do not make major investments in so-called mega-projects unless they believe that the economy is sound and the nation is being well managed.

The honourable senator who appears to be critical of the Minister of Finance is aware, of course, that being Minister of Finance under the economic conditions that exist at the present time, not only in Canada but throughout the world, is one of the most thankless positions that can be held in government. He recalls his days as Premier of Manitoba when some of the economic and budgetary decisions facing his government were not always very easy.

Hon. Jack Marshall: He had the softest job he ever had.

Senator Perrault: The position of the Minister of Finance is a tough, difficult and lonely job. I hope that Senator Roblin is not suggesting to us today that there is anything wrong or dishonourable in the fact that the Minister of Finance may modify certain proposed budget measures if a greater good can be served by modifications. This is a responsive government which has not only demonstrated flexibility in constitutional matters, but in budgetary policies as well. We are going to continue to be that way.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Is he going to give us a speech about the weather, too?

Senator Perrault: If the Minister of Finance today declared in the other chamber that he would not make any changes in the budget, I suspect that he would be equally vilified by the opposition for being inflexible—

Senator Smith: Would the leader like to make a speech on inflation, too?

Senator Perrault: —but because he is flexible and may be willing to make certain changes in that budget, he is attacked because he may be responsive to the idea of change.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Question!

Senator Perrault: And it may be asked how it is possible for any Minister of Finance ever to win a political popularity contest.

Senator Flynn: Gee whiz!

Senator Roblin: Well, he can win a political popularity contest if his policies are productive and effective for national development.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): If they were, you wouldn't want to hear about it.

Senator Roblin: I don't mind hearing about it. I want to make it clear to my honourable friend, in case he has any doubts, that I have plenty of confidence in the Canadian economy. I have all the confidence in the world in the Canadian economy. I think it is so strong and vigorous that it can survive whatever my honourable friends opposite do to it, but I have to say that I do not have any confidence in my honourable friend; none at all. The economy is another matter altogether.

As for the Minister of Finance, he is an estimable gentleman, and I am sure he is doing his best in very difficult circumstances. But if his best involves the necessity of making a continual stream of changes in what was supposed to be the national budget, then one has to weigh that in the balance when one looks at the situation. I do not object to my honourable friend making changes in the budget. I do not criticize him for that; I criticize him if it is not necessary. If it is necessary, then it is good that he does it.

When I rose it was only to ask when he is going to do it, because of the people who are concerned and whose interests are at stake. Therefore, I ask my honourable friend, when is he going to do it? He says he does not know, but I ask him to make inquiries of the Minister of Finance, and then, perhaps this afternoon, he can give us a date.

Senator Perrault: Certain changes may be announced at an appropriate time. I know that the remarks of Senator Roblin will be read with avid interest by the Minister of Finance.

Senator Roblin: I think he has better things to do.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government on the same subject. Due to the 20 per cent cutback in VIA Rail services there are quite a number of VIA Rail employees whose jobs will be terminated. Many of those employees had opted for early retirement and would have taken a lump-sum payment.

[Senator Smith.]

Due to this budget, they find that that is now taxable, and many of them have elected not to retire, which results in junior members, who have no benefits coming to them, being bumped to the end of the line and they are being laid off in their stead. The same problem is becoming apparent in many other sectors across Canada.

Was that problem taken into account when the budget was written, or have steps been taken to correct that problem as well?

Senator Perrault: I can assure honourable senators that the question has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance by many members of Parliament serving in both houses. The matter is under consideration now by the Minister of Finance.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—LAKE GROUP LIMITED—REHABILITATION OF FISH PLANT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, and perhaps it would give him some food for thought in making an announcement next week, although not equal to the one he made today but one that would concern a great number of employees. It has to do with a request from the Lake Group Limited of Newfoundland that employs some 2,500 people and purchases fish from another 1,600 fisherman, the offshoot jobs involving about 20,000 people. They requested of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans some $15 million in order to rehabilitate their fish plant.

Since the minister is Chairman of the Cabinet Committee on Economic Development, of which the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is a member, could he advise us if that has come up in his cabinet committee recently; and, if not would he consider it and discuss it with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, my honourable friend knows very well that cabinet ministers cannot discuss what is on the agenda, or even the agenda itself, of cabinet meetings. While he may be attempting to get me to make a comment on what is on the agenda, he knows very well that I am unable to do so. If he is asking me—and I do not believe he is; at least, not in the terminology that he used—to convey his message to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, I will certainly do that.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It has become a little archaic, because it refers to a question I asked on March 12 concerning the Canadian membership in the International Joint Commission. On that date the minister stated:

The government is in the process of selecting appropriate persons to fill the Canadian vacancies . . . We expect to announce those appointments shortly.

Considering that there are some very important matters to face that very important international body, and that Canada has only two commissioners in place, could the Leader of the Government indicate what has been the reason for delay and when we can expect that the Canadian complement on the commission will be brought up to date?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I hope that the appointments are imminent.

THE BUDGET

VALIDITY OF ECONOMIC PROJECTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The November 12 budget projected 1981 real growth to be a little over 3.5 per cent and unemployment about 7.25 per cent. In view of the current statistics that were discussed yesterday, I wonder whether the minister still considers those projections to be valid.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, when the Minister of Finance makes a revision of those projections, based on the ongoing changes or development of all the economic indicators, I will bring that information to the house. But, so far as I know to date, the projections that were made in the budget for the whole of the year 1982 are still valid.

REVISION OF EQUALIZATION SYSTEM

Hon. C. William Doody: I have a further question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, which refers to a question I asked a short time ago dealing with changes in the equalization formula and the benchmark of Ontario, which is now the pertinent guideline. In view of the fact that this formula is extremely important to at least six or seven of the provinces, could the minister try to obtain the information for us?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, honourable senators.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL SERVICES—USER-PAY POLICY— POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the introduction of user fees, which are being either promoted, condoned or encouraged by the provincial governments, meets the federal government's policy of universal medical care.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question is an important one and I will take it as notice. It may be useful to bring to the Senate an extended statement on the subject. Certainly, there have been concerns on our part that the national goals of high quality medical care and hospital care established by the federal government some time ago—that is, the maintenance of high medical and hospital care standards for all Canadians wherever they live in this country—could be affected adversely by the introduction of “user-pay” policies in certain provinces. It is an important question and I will have a statement prepared and brought to the Senate.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault:

THAT, WHEREAS in the past certain amendments to the Constitution of Canada have been made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom at the request and with the consent of Canada;

AND WHEREAS it is in accord with the status of Canada as an independent state that Canadians be able to amend their Constitution in Canada in all respects;

AND WHEREAS it is also desirable to provide in the Constitution of Canada for the recognition of certain fundamental rights and freedoms and to make other amendments to that Constitution;

CONSIDÉRANT :

que le Parlement du Royaume-Uni a modifié à plusieurs reprises la Constitution du Canada à la demande et avec le consentement de celui-ci;

que, de par le statut d'État indépendant du Canada, il est légitime que les Canadiens aient tout pouvoir pour modifier leur Constitution au Canada;

qu'il est souhaitable d'inscrire dans la Constitution du Canada la reconnaissance de certains droits et libertés fondamentaux et d'y apporter d'autres modifications,

A respectful address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

il est proposé que soit présentée respectueusement à Sa Majesté la Reine l'adresse dont la teneur suit :

15

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

A Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine,
Très Gracieuse Souveraine :

We, Your Majesty's loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, respectfully approach Your Majesty, requesting that you may graciously be pleased to cause to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom a measure containing the recitals and clauses hereinafter set forth:

25

Nous, membres du Sénat du Canada réunis en Parlement, fidèles sujets de Votre Majesté, demandons respectueusement à Votre Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi ainsi conçu :

20

ANNEXE A—SCHEDULE A

An Act to give effect to a request by the Senate and House of Commons of Canada

Whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to give effect to the provisions hereinafter set forth and the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty requesting that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a Bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose.

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. The Constitution Act, 1981 set out in Schedule B to this Act is hereby enacted for and shall have the force of law in Canada and shall come into force as provided in that Act.

2. No Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the Constitution Act, 1981 comes into force shall extend to Canada as part of its law.

3. So far as it is not contained in Schedule B, the French version of this Act is set out in Schedule A to this Act and has the same authority in Canada as the English version thereof.

4. This Act may be cited as the Canada Act.

Loi donnant suite à une demande du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes du Canada

Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine, considérant :

qu'à la demande et avec le consentement du Canada, le Parlement du Royaume-Uni est invité à adopter une loi visant à donner effet aux dispositions énoncées ci-après et que le Sénat et la Chambre des communes du Canada réunis en Parlement ont présenté une adresse demandant à Sa Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi à cette fin, sur l'avis et du consentement des Lords spirituels et temporels et des Communes réunis en Parlement, et par l'autorité de celui-ci, édicte :

1. La Loi constitutionnelle de 1981, énoncée à l'annexe B, est édictée pour le Canada et y a force de loi. Elle entre en vigueur conformément à ses dispositions.

2. Les lois adoptées par le Parlement du Royaume-Uni après l'entrée en vigueur de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1981 ne font pas partie du droit du Canada.

3. La partie de la version française de la présente loi qui figure à l'annexe A a force de loi au Canada au même titre que la version anglaise correspondante.

4. Titre abrégé de la présente loi : Loi sur le Canada.

Minority Language Educational Rights

Droits à l'instruction dans la langue de la minorité

Language of instruction

23. (1) Citizens of Canada

(a) whose first language learned and still understood is that of the English or French linguistic minority population of the province in which they reside, or have the right to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in that language in that province.

(b) who have received their primary school instruction in Canada in English or French and reside in a province where that language in which they received that instruction is the language of the English or French linguistic minority population of the province,

23. (1) Les citoyens canadiens :
a) dont la première langue apprise et 20 encore comprise est celle de la minorité francophone ou anglophone de la province où ils résident,
b) qui ont reçu leur instruction, au niveau primaire, en français ou en anglais au 25 Canada et qui résident dans une province où la langue dans laquelle ils ont reçu cette instruction est celle de la minorité francophone ou anglophone de la province,

(3) The right of citizens of Canada under subsections (1) and (2) to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the language of the English or French linguistic minority population of a province

(a) applies wherever in the province the number of children of citizens who have such a right is sufficient to warrant the provision to them out of public funds of 10 minority language instruction; and

(b) includes, where the number of those children so warrants, the right to have them receive that instruction in minority language educational facilities provided 15 out of public funds.

(3) Le droit reconnu aux citoyens canadiens par les paragraphes (1) et (2) de faire instruire leurs enfants, aux niveaux primaire et secondaire, dans la langue de la minorité 5 francophone ou anglophone d'une province :

a) s'exerce partout dans la province où le nombre des enfants des citoyens qui ont ce droit est suffisant pour justifier à leur endroit la prestation, sur les fonds publics, de l'instruction dans la langue de la 10 minorité;

b) comprend, lorsque le nombre de ces enfants le justifie, le droit de les faire instruire dans des établissements d'enseignement de la minorité linguistique finan- 15 cés sur les fonds publics.

General procedure for amending
Constitution of Canada

38. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by

(a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and

(b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces

PROCÉDURE DE MODIFICATION DE LA CONSTITUTION DU CANADA

38. (1) La Constitution du Canada peut être modifiée par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada, autorisée à la fois :

a) par des résolutions du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes;

b) par des résolutions des assemblées législatives d'au moins deux tiers des provinces dont la population confondue représente, selon le recensement général le plus récent à l'époque, au moins cinquante pour cent de la population de toutes les provinces.

Majority of members

(2) An amendment made under subsection (1) that derogates from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province shall require a resolution supported by a majority of the members of each of the Senate, the House of Commons and the legislative assemblies required under subsection (1).

5 (2) Une modification faite conformément au paragraphe (1) mais dérogatoire à la compétence législative, aux droits de propriété ou à tous autres droits ou privilèges d'une législature ou d'un gouvernement provincial exige une résolution adoptée à la 10 majorité des sénateurs, des députés fédéraux et des députés de chacune des assemblées législatives du nombre requis de provinces.

Expression of dissent

(3) An amendment referred to in subsection (2) shall not have effect in a province the legislative assembly of which has expressed its dissent thereto by resolution supported by a majority of its members prior to the issue of the proclamation to which the amendment relates unless that legislative assembly, subsequently, by resolution supported by a majority of its members, revokes its dissent and authorizes the amendment.

15 (3) La modification visée au paragraphe (2) est sans effet dans une province dont l'assemblée législative a, avant la prise de la proclamation, exprimé son désaccord par une résolution adoptée à la majorité des députés, 20 sauf si cette assemblée, par résolution également adoptée à la majorité, revient sur son désaccord et autorise la modification.

Revocation of dissent

(4) A resolution of dissent made for the purposes of subsection (3) may be revoked at any time before or after the issue of the proclamation to which it relates.

25 (4) La résolution de désaccord visée au paragraphe (3) peut être révoquée à tout moment, indépendamment de la date de la proclamation à laquelle elle se rapporte. 25

Restriction on proclamation

39. (1) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) before the expiration of one year from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder, unless the legislative assembly of each province has previously adopted a resolution of assent or dissent.

30 (1) La proclamation visée au paragraphe 38(1) ne peut être prise dans l'année suivant l'adoption de la résolution à l'origine de la procédure de modification que si l'assemblée législative de chaque province a 30 préalablement adopté une résolution d'agrément ou de désaccord.

Idem

(2) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) after the expiration of three years from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder.

35 (2) La proclamation visée au paragraphe 38(1) ne peut être prise que dans les trois ans suivant l'adoption de la résolution à l'origine 35 de la procédure de modification.

Compensation

40. Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers provincial legislative powers relating to education or other cultural matters from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

40. Le Canada fournit une juste compensation aux provinces auxquelles ne s'applique pas une modification faite conformément au paragraphe 38(1) et relative, en matière 40 d'éducation ou dans d'autres domaines culturels, à un transfert de compétences législatives provinciales au Parlement.

PART VI

PARTIE VI

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

MODIFICATION DE LA LOI CONSTITUTIONNELLE DE 1867

50. The Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly named the British North America Act, 1867) is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 92 thereof, the following heading and section:

50. La Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 (antérieurement désignée sous le titre : Acte de l'Amérique du Nord britannique, 1867) est modifiée par insertion, après l'article 92, de la rubrique et de l'article suivants :

"Non-Renewable Natural Resources, Forestry Resources and Electrical Energy

«Ressources naturelles non renouvelables, ressources forestières et énergie électrique

92A. (1) In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to

92A. (1) La législature de chaque province a compétence exclusive pour légiférer dans les domaines suivants :

(a) exploration for non-renewable natural resources in the province;

(b) development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom; and

a) prospection des ressources naturelles non renouvelables de la province;

b) exploitation, conservation et gestion des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, y compris leur rythme de production primaire;

(c) development, conservation and management of sites and facilities in the province for the generation and production of electrical energy.

c) aménagement, conservation et gestion des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique.

(2) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the export from the province to another part of Canada of the primary production from non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the production from facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy, but such laws may not authorize or provide for discrimination in prices or in supplies exported to another part of Canada.

(2) La législature de chaque province a compétence pour légiférer en ce qui concerne l'exportation, hors de la province, à destination d'une autre partie du Canada, de la production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, ainsi que de la production d'énergie électrique de la province, sous réserve de ne pas adopter de lois autorisant ou prévoyant des disparités de prix ou des disparités dans les exportations destinées à une autre partie du Canada.

Modification de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867

Compétence provinciale

Exportation hors des provinces

Authority of Parliament

(3) Nothing in subsection (2) derogates from the authority of Parliament to enact laws in relation to the matters referred to in that subsection and, where such a law of Parliament and a law of a province conflict, the law of Parliament prevails to the extent of the conflict. 5

Taxation of resources

(4) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation in respect of 10

(a) non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the primary production therefrom, and 15

(b) sites and facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy and the production therefrom, whether or not such production is exported in whole or in part from the province, but such laws may not authorize or provide for taxation that differentiates between production exported to another part of Canada and production not exported from the province. 20 25

"Primary
production"

(5) The expression "primary production" has the meaning assigned by the Sixth Schedule.

Existing powers
or rights

(6) Nothing in subsections (1) to (5) derogates from any powers or rights that a legislature or government of a province had immediately before the coming into force of this section. 30

Idem

51. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following Schedule:

"THE SIXTH SCHEDULE

Primary Production from Non-Renewable Natural Resources and Forestry Resources

1. For the purposes of section 92A of this Act,

(3) Le paragraphe (2) ne porte pas atteinte au pouvoir du Parlement de légiférer dans les domaines visés à ce paragraphe, les dispositions d'une loi du Parlement adoptée dans ces domaines l'emportant sur les dispositions incompatibles d'une loi provinciale. 5

(4) La législature de chaque province a compétence pour prélever des sommes d'argent par tout mode ou système de taxation : 10

a) des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, ainsi que de la production primaire qui en est tirée; 15

b) des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique, ainsi que de cette production même.

Cette compétence peut s'exercer indépendamment du fait que la production en cause soit ou non, en totalité ou en partie, exportée hors de la province, mais les lois adoptées dans ces domaines ne peuvent autoriser ou prévoir une taxation qui établisse une distinction entre la production exportée à destination d'une autre partie du Canada et la production non exportée hors de la province. 20 25

(5) L'expression «production primaire» a le sens qui lui est donné dans la sixième annexe. 30 «Production primaire»

51. Ladite loi est en outre modifiée par adjonction de l'annexe suivante :

«SIXIÈME ANNEXE

Production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières

1. Pour l'application de l'article 92A : 40

(a) production from a non-renewable natural resource is primary production therefrom if

(i) it is in the form in which it exists upon its recovery or severance from its natural state, or

(ii) it is a product resulting from processing or refining the resource, and is not a manufactured product or a product resulting from refining crude oil, refining upgraded heavy crude oil, refining gases or liquids derived from coal or refining a synthetic equivalent of crude oil; and

(b) production from a forestry resource is primary production therefrom if it consists of sawlogs, poles, lumber, wood chips, sawdust or any other primary wood product, or wood pulp, and is not a product manufactured from wood."

a) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource naturelle non renouvelable :

(i) soit le produit qui se présente sous la même forme que lors de son extraction du milieu naturel,

(ii) soit le produit non manufacturé de la transformation, du raffinage ou de l'affinage d'une ressource, à l'exception du produit du raffinage du pétrole brut, du raffinage du pétrole brut lourd amélioré, du raffinage des gaz ou des liquides dérivés du charbon ou du raffinage d'un équivalent synthétique du pétrole brut;

b) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource forestière la production constituée de billots, de poteaux, de bois d'œuvre, de copeaux, de sciure ou d'autre produit primaire du bois, ou de pâte de bois, à l'exception d'un produit manufacturé en bois.»

PART VII

GENERAL

52. (1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

(2) The Constitution of Canada includes
(a) the Canada Act, including this Act;
(b) the Acts and orders referred to in Schedule I; and
(c) any amendment to any Act or order referred to in paragraph (a) or (b).

(3) Amendments to the Constitution of Canada shall be made only in accordance with the authority contained in the Constitution of Canada.

53. (1) The enactments referred to in Column I of Schedule I are hereby repealed or amended to the extent indicated in Column II thereof and, unless repealed, shall continue as law in Canada under the names set out in Column III thereof.

PARTIE VII

DISPOSITIONS GÉNÉRALES

52. (1) La Constitution du Canada est la loi suprême du Canada; elle rend inopérantes les dispositions incompatibles de toute autre règle de droit.

(2) La Constitution du Canada comprend :
a) la Loi sur le Canada, y compris la présente loi;
b) les textes législatifs et les décrets figurant à l'annexe I;
c) les modifications des textes législatifs et des décrets mentionnés aux alinéas a) ou b).

(3) La Constitution du Canada ne peut être modifiée que conformément aux pouvoirs conférés par elle.

53. (1) Les textes législatifs et les décrets énumérés à la colonne I de l'annexe I sont abrogés ou modifiés dans la mesure indiquée à la colonne II. Sauf abrogation, ils restent en vigueur en tant que lois du Canada sous les titres mentionnés à la colonne III.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, first of all, I would like to congratulate all the senators who preceded me in this debate, and particularly the former provincial premiers—without being less appreciative of my other colleagues—because I listened with great interest to the comments made by Senator Manning, Senator Roblin and Senator Hicks, who had some exciting moments when they were premiers in their respective provinces. They understand the present situation, and although their conclusions may differ, what they say is always worthwhile.

[English]

A few weeks ago I saw a psychologist—he was an author—being interviewed on television. He had just completed a book entitled The Perfectionist, and his conclusion was that a perfectionist never, or very seldom, does anything, because he or she feels that everything he or she does has to be perfect—which seldom happens. That made me think. If everything we do has to be perfect in every respect, then we do not do anything, because we are human beings and almost everything we do is not perfect.

Such is the case with the Constitution resolution now before us. It is not perfect, but there is a provision contained in it that approaches perfection. It is that we can improve upon it as we mature and as we discuss it further. We can improve upon it because of the amending formula.

The Constitution resolution is not, by any stretch of the imagination, a final document. It is perhaps final with regard to the current session, but we can improve upon it year by year, as we learn from our experience of living under the provisions of the new Constitution.

There have been occasions in the lives of all of us when we have felt extremely proud to be Canadian. I have experience those moments, and, indeed, I am proud each day to be a Canadian. I should like to mention a few occasions, perhaps not in order of importance.

I recall VE Day, which was May 8, 1945. At the time I was a young man, and on that day I was proud to be a Canadian because our Canadian forces had helped considerably in successfully ending a major world conflict.

I was also proud on June 27, 1960, which was the day on which the New Brunswick election was held.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Robichaud: I was proud to be a Canadian on that day because the people of New Brunswick elected for the first time an Acadian as premier.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Robichaud: I was proud to be a Canadian in February 1965, because the government of the day had finally accepted and adopted a Canadian flag, ensuring our identity as Canadians. I was very proud.

● (1050)

I remember that on July 1, 1967, we had a huge ceremony here on Parliament Hill. Her Majesty the Queen was here with Prince Philip. Mr. Pearson was Prime Minister; Mr. Diefenbaker was Leader of the Opposition. Both spoke and, in order to respect a principle, both spoke partly in French. At the conclusion of the ceremony, I was talking with Premier Robarts and Premier Johnson, and Prince Philip stepped down, came to us, after having listened to Mr. Pearson and Mr. Diefenbaker, and said, "I have never heard such fractured and fragmented French in all my life." At least, it was an effort on the part of both Mr. Pearson and Mr. Diefenbaker to respect our country's two official languages.

I was also proud to be a Canadian at that moment, back in 1972, when Team Canada was playing against the Russian hockey team in that last game, when three thousand Canadians at the arena in Moscow, sang O Canada. Of course, we won the game. I am not a singer by any stretch of the imagination—I have no singing voice—but I sang that night with all the emotion and enthusiasm that I could command. I was proud to be a Canadian.

I was also proud last Wednesday afternoon, at about 3 o'clock, when I heard the members in the other place sing O Canada with such enthusiasm. I was proud to be a Canadian.

I would not want to live anywhere else. When we think of any country where we might like to live outside of Canada, we must ask ourselves which one we would accept. The answer is, of course, none. We live in the best country in the world, despite certain problems that we have to face within our family occasionally, be they problems concerning the economy, be they problems of language, be they problems arising out of discussions taking place among the provinces or between the provinces and the federal authority. We are darned lucky to have been born in this country, or to have elected to live in this country and to have accepted Canada as our home.

I am proud of being a participant in this debate and to join finally with the vast majority of Canadians in saying, "Yes, at last we have our own Constitution, a Constitution that we will work on, in order to improve it day by day."

I know some senators are going to oppose the Constitution. That is their privilege and their prerogative.

[Translation]

But as a representative of the Province of New Brunswick and as an Acadian, how can you expect me to object to a Constitution, to a Charter that says in Section 16:

English and French are the official languages of New Brunswick and have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the legislature and government of New Brunswick.

How could I object to that?

Section 17 reads as follows:

Everyone has the right to use English or French in any debates and other proceedings of Parliament.

And how could I object to that?

Section 18 reads:

The statutes, records and journals of the legislature of New Brunswick shall be printed and published in English and French and both language versions are equally authoritative.

How could I object to that?

Section 19 reads:

Either English or French may be used by any person in, or in any pleading in or process issuing from, any court of New Brunswick.

What objection could I have to that?

Section 20 reads:

Any member of the public in New Brunswick has the right to communicate with, and to receive available services from, any office of an institution of the legislature or government of New Brunswick in English or French.

How could I object to a principle as fair as this one? What I just read is what the people of New Brunswick wanted when in 1970 New Brunswick was the first and only Canadian province to proclaim English and French as its two official languages.

This proclamation by an act of the legislature was made following the recommendations of the Laurendeau-Dunton Report, the report of the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

In New Brunswick, about 67 per cent of the population is English-speaking and 33 per cent is Acadian or French-speaking. When the Laurendeau-Dunton Report was published, it contained a recommendation that bilingual districts be created in Canada in areas where about 10 per cent of the population spoke the other official language. The provincial government or legislature could declare these areas bilingual districts.

So I looked at the map of New Brunswick and I tried to find some bilingual districts. I said to myself: Where are we going to create a bilingual district? We cannot make small districts, we cannot make New Brunswick into a checker board. We are going to declare the entire province a bilingual district. The legislature unanimously agreed with the principle that the whole province would become a bilingual district. The government that succeeded mine also agreed with this concept. That is why the Constitution is a piece of legislation that suits us perfectly.

Of course, there are some shortcomings in the Charter and in the Resolution. It is sad to think that we were unable to get unanimous support. I would like to borrow an expression used by the Minister of Justice, Mr. Chrétien, who said: "I think there are nine and a half provinces that are in favour of the Charter".

I am always uneasy and I tend to get very upset, when I hear the expression "the nine English provinces". The nine English provinces have agreed to the principles contained in the Charter. The only French-speaking province does not agree.

I am from New Brunswick. My province is, first of all, Canadian. My province is not English. There may be a majority of English-speaking people, but my province is not an English province. We are not living in England. My province is not French either. We are not living in France. My province is bilingual.

Now if I do not speak French exactly the same way as Mr. Lévesque does, that is not my fault. I speak French to the best of my ability. I am just as francophone as René Lévesque, even if I do live in New Brunswick. People are also saying that a government totally foreign to Quebec wants to force this Charter on Quebec, and that government happens to be the Government of Canada. The Prime Minister's name is Trudeau, his Minister of Justice is called Chrétien, and the co-chairman of the committee that worked day and night to reach this settlement is called Joyal.

Are these people foreign to Quebec? Is Pierre De Bané a foreigner in Quebec? Is Marc Lalonde alien to Quebec? Is Yvon Pinard a stranger to Quebec? And are Charles Lapointe and Pierre Bussières not Quebecers?

I am astonished to hear people say that the people I have just mentioned are strangers to Quebec, that a foreign government is forcing certain things on Quebec.

I feel that concessions have been made for the benefit of Quebec with which I can agree wholeheartedly, such as fiscal compensation for opting out of joint projects. As far as language and culture are concerned I think that is excellent. Perhaps further amendments may be added. I repeat, this Charter is not perfect, but it is drafted in such a way that it can be improved over the years. Amendments have been submitted. There are already two, and there may be more.

• (1100)

[English]

These amendments, to some degree, make sense. I would like to discuss the amendment moved by Senator Walker last night to the effect that section 47 should be completely deleted because perhaps it has to do with the future of the Senate of Canada, as we know it. Honourable senators, I shall vote for the resolution in toto. Section 47 can only take effect if seven provinces, comprising a minimum of 50 per cent of the population of Canada, want to abolish the Senate. I do not believe that it is the wish of the majority of Canadians that the Senate be abolished. If I believed that was the case, I would feel very uncomfortable sitting in this seat. I do not think that the Senate will ever be abolished. There may be some modifications or some reforms suggested as we go along, but the Senate of Canada cannot be abolished if we are to continue to live in the free and prosperous country that we have known for 114 years.

There are many things to be said about the Charter of Rights. If I were to go into it further, I would only be repeating what has already been said. There are those who say they will vote for it, but without the enthusiasm that they would like to have. Honourable senators, I am going to vote for it with a lot of enthusiasm because of the amending formula—because it is not in its final form; we can and we will improve upon it. I shall not abstain, honourable senators. I shall vote for this resolution with all of the enthusiasm at my command.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, I have waited patiently for the opportunity to come to this chamber to make a few brief comments on a particular aspect of this resolution. In order to do so, I am drawing on my previous addresses and speeches within the confines of this venerable chamber, elsewhere in this country, and in the United States.

I stand here today as the advocate for the rights of the unborn child. If anyone had heard my views in this regard about 10 years ago, there would be no question in his mind as to the position I took then and take today.

● (1110)

In the United States of America most states recognize that the unborn child does have rights under the law. A mother may sue for the support of her unborn child or may hold a defendant liable for injuries sustained by her unborn child as a result of accident or assault. An unborn child may share in an inheritance or in workmen's compensation benefits. A pregnant woman convicted of a capital crime may not be executed until after her baby is born. The United States Constitution, in the Fifth Amendment, provides that no person shall be deprived of life without due process.

It is certainly a matter of pause for the medical profession to decide whether two doctors in agreement, or even an "abortion committee," constitute due process. I wonder if the Minister of Justice can answer that question.

It seems ironic that, while we have established institutes of child health throughout the country which specifically direct their attention to child development from the time of conception, and while tens of millions are being spent by various national foundations to improve the lot of the unborn, we should see in this day a movement for more liberal fetal indications for abortion.

The acceleration of change in human society is, in large part, the end result of scientific innovations which sometimes, but not always, deserve to be called advances. In the amazing expansion of our scientific knowledge, however, there has been no proven contradiction of spiritual values, no valid opposition between science, on the one hand, and the basic concepts of morality in human society, or man's belief in the spirit of man or God, on the other.

To discover wisdom in human affairs we must turn to the best elaborations of human thought. They come from the past and the present. Scientific method may be of great help, but in the end truth is to be found in the minds of men.

Shakespeare expressed a basic truth when he put these words into the mouth of Richard II:

My brain I'll prove the female to my soul,

My soul the father: and these two beget

A generation of still-breeding thoughts,

And these same thoughts people this little world;

The materialist assertion that the brain and its mechanisms explain the mind is an unproven hypothesis. It is, if you like, a matter of faith, like the assumptions of the Christian church and the other religions.

The time has come when man must learn to control civilization on this earth. But time is short. Human society cannot survive without the institution of the family. By strengthening the modern family in the present context of society and establishing an accepted code of common morality and teaching reasonable self-discipline and service to others, civilization can be controlled.

In the other place the other day the word "dream" was used. That is nothing more than an aberration of conscience. I wish to demythologize the word "conscience." I have a most accommodating conscience, and I have come to the melancholy conclusion that my conscience is a somewhat untrustworthy guide when it permits me to do something I want to do, but is extremely trustworthy when it prevents, or at least tries to prevent, me from doing what I particularly wish to do. It is, I find, prudent and helpful to remember, to quote Hilaire Belloc, that "the devil is not so black as he has been painted"—a profound saying which is the clue to many modern troubles.

Honourable senators, ten years ago I felt compelled to speak to the amendments to the Criminal Code that were being introduced as a package, involving capital punishment, abortion and human sexuality, because I felt they were wrong. I feel the same today as I did then. I therefore intend to move an amendment to section 7 of the resolution.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Sullivan: Honourable senators, I therefore move, seconded by Senator Macdonald:

That section 7 of the Resolution be amended to read as follows:

7. Everyone, including the unborn child, has the right to life, which life begins at conception and which right is assertable from the moment of conception. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

● (1120)

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to the order adopted on December 2, 1981, the recorded division is deferred.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, first, I would like to convey my congratulations to all those honourable senators who have spoken on this resolution so far. I cannot help feeling—and we have just had an example of it—that the speeches presented thus far have been of a very high quality. Indeed, they reflect, in my view—and, obviously, I would want to exclude myself from this generalization—the high calibre of representation which the people of Canada have in this historic chamber.

While I am on the matter of congratulations, I would particularly like to congratulate our esteemed colleague, Senator Hays, for the role he played during the weeks and months that the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution discussed the original draft of the resolution.

I realize that I may be accused of political partisanship in saying this, but I take advantage of this opportunity to express my personal congratulations to the Prime Minister of Canada, who, in my view, has acted in a manner which will be remembered in history and which in some respects takes us back to the very early days of this nation when Sir John A. Macdonald and his confrères were working in an attempt to bring about a union of the various parts of British North America.

It is very difficult, in participating in this debate, not to repeat what has already been said in many cases many times. However, I shall try to steer clear of such repetition. I shall say a few words on two matters relating to the resolution.

The first such matter refers to my native province of Newfoundland or, as we call it in Newfoundland, the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador. It struck me, as I am sure it did other Newfoundlanders, that there was a strong possibility, indeed, a probability that in the last year or so Newfoundland's role would be misunderstood and misinterpreted.

I think we have to remind ourselves that Newfoundland—and I do not say this in a boastful way—is different from other parts of Canada. The people there have a different background, historically, economically, and culturally. As a result, Newfoundland sometimes must plead for special consideration of one kind or another. Newfoundland has experienced a continuing history of economic problems. Although it is one of the oldest parts of European settlement in North America, Newfoundland has only on three occasions in its entire history experienced full employment. These were during the war of 1812-14, the latter years of World War I and the latter years of World War II. For the rest of the period, beginning from the early days of European settlement to the present, there has been relatively massive unemployment in the province. This, of course, is a factor which is always in the back of the minds of the people of Newfoundland. Newfoundlanders are very proud people, and they do not want massive unemployment as an integral part of their economic history, any more than the rest of Canada would want it.

Honourable senators, I am sure that most of Canada is not aware that the negotiations for the union of Newfoundland with Canada began with the early visit of Lord Durham to this country. Most Canadians are familiar with the negotiations which began in 1947-48 and resulted in Newfoundland joining Canada in 1949. In this report to the British Government in 1839, I believe, Lord Durham recommended that Newfoundland join Upper and Lower Canada. It is rather unfortunate that he was not able, through circumstances beyond his control, to follow through on what he had in mind at the time. After discussing the matter in central Canada, he intended to stop in Newfoundland to carry on negotiations with the legislature and the government there, with the view to inducing them to join Upper and Lower Canada. Unfortunately, this plan fell by the boards.

During the 1860s, while negotiations with regard to Confederation were going on in central Canada, it was hoped that Newfoundland, which was represented at the Quebec Conference, would join in Confederation. Unfortunately, that also fell through, and in the election of 1869 the entire idea was massively defeated by the people of Newfoundland.

During the 1880s Newfoundland established a reciprocity treaty with the United States which guaranteed the province access to American markets. Since Canada did not enjoy this access, it protested to the British government, which annulled the legislation. This created a great deal of bitterness among the people of Newfoundland and, indeed, it could be considered as one of the difficulties in the subsequent negotiations between Newfoundland and Canada.

In the 1890s Newfoundland suffered from a wholesale depression. There was an economic and financial collapse. Coincidentally, St. John's was literally destroyed by fire, and once more Newfoundland was in serious trouble. Negotiations to join Confederation were again opened with Canada. Unfortunately, the then Prime Minister, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, made the terms of union so stringent and so impossible that Newfoundland said it would rather starve to death than accept them, and again the idea fell through.

● (1130)

Of course, Newfoundlanders were the victims of the Great Depression which, curiously enough, did not hit that province until 1932, when there was a world-wide collapse of the fishery and of the mining markets. Once again, Newfoundland was prostrate, and again approaches were made to the Government of Canada. The then Prime Minister of Canada, The Right Honourable R. B. Bennett—and I do not say this critically—stated that some of the provinces of Canada were bankrupt and his responsibility was to them, and that he could do nothing for Newfoundland. He made it clear that, if Newfoundland expressed a desire to enter the union, the government at that time would not be interested. The matter was not raised again until 1946. Thus, for nearly 100 years Newfoundland negotiated to join the union.

This brings me to Newfoundland's attitude towards the constitutional resolution. When the terms of the union were agreed upon between Newfoundland and Canada in 1949, the people of Newfoundland were assured—and, naturally, were anxious to believe—that those terms were inviolable. However, the feeling among some is that under this Constitution that may not be the case. I believe that for the most part those fears are groundless.

As one who played a role, however modest, in inducing the people of Newfoundland to join Confederation, I am prepared to support this present resolution. However, two or three matters need to be emphasized. I do not think that, in any projected constitution, we can ever hope to have unanimity; some degree of consensus, yes, but not unanimity. I think it is foolish to expect that. My support of this constitutional resolution does not mean that I regard it as perfect. It does not cover all the things I should like to see done, and it covers a few things that I would prefer not to see done. What is true of my feelings is probably true of the feelings of other Canadians who are familiar with this resolution. Given the circumstances, there is no way we will achieve unanimity.

We must be careful that we do not create a “bed of Procrustes.” You will remember that in the Greek myth there was nothing wrong with the bed of Procrustes so long as you fitted into that bed. The trouble arose if you were a bit too long or a bit too short, and then you were in real trouble. We must apply that analogy to any constitution we adopt. There is no way that a constitution can be completely inviolable.

A constitution can only be as strong and as good as the people who construct it. The strength, the stability and the ultimate value of a constitution has to depend not on the constitution itself, since constitutions can be overthrown in 24 hours. What may, on paper, appear to be the best constitutions ever devised by the mind of man have, in practice, proved to be useless.

However, we do need a constitution. Senator Sullivan, just a moment ago, spoke of an “aberration.” To me, it is an aberration of history that one sovereign nation should, for all the years since the Statute of Westminster, have its Constitution in the hands of another sovereign nation. If we are to maintain our self-respect and the respect of the rest of the world, we must patriate our Constitution.

This action will not revolutionize Canada overnight; it may not have much of an effect one way or another, although I think it will, but I will not go into that now. With our present economic, cultural and political problems, we should remind ourselves that we are still one of the favoured countries of the world. Like most honourable senators in this chamber, over the past 30 years I have had an opportunity to do a fair amount of travelling in other countries of the world. I learned from that experience that, given a chance, millions, and perhaps hundreds of millions of the world's people would like to come to Canada to live. That is no accident.

I believe this instrument will work, not because it is perfect, but because I believe in the integrity and the essential morality of the Canadian people. I have faith in this Constitution not because, as I said earlier, it is a perfect instrument, which it is not, but because I have faith in Canada.

[Senator Rowe.]

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I begin my remarks today by making it very clear that they are addressed only to the amendment moved by Senator Roblin and do not constitute what I hope will be my comments upon the resolution itself. I should read the amendment, to refresh our minds as to what it says. It states:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 be amended by striking out Section 40 and substituting the following therefor:

“40. In the event that a province dissents from an amendment conferring legislative jurisdiction on Parliament, the Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of that province, taking into account the per capita costs to exercise that jurisdiction in the provinces which have approved the amendment.

Perhaps, at the same time, I should refresh our memories on the wording of section 40, which can be found at page xviii in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of December 2, 1981. That section reads as follows:

40. Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1)—

Honourable senators will remember that an amendment under subsection 38(1) requires the approval of at least two-thirds of the provinces having at least 50 per cent of the population of all the provinces.

● (1140)

Honourable senators, to begin again, section 40 states:

Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers provincial legislative powers relating to education or other cultural matters from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

As we have been told more than once, this does provide compensation, but compensation only in matters relating to education or other cultural matters. What the amendment seeks to do is simply enlarge the scope of section 40 from the limited application of compensation for legislative powers relating to education or other cultural matters to one of general application.

As I think Senator Roblin said, in moving his amendment, a provision for general compensation would not be anything new or startling. It was agreed to by all the provinces last April. Even the federal government has now accepted the principle because, as I understand the comments made a day or two ago by the Honourable Serge Joyal, the minister responsible for dealing with constitutional matters in Quebec, he says it can be done after patriation, which is clearly an acceptance of the principle. If the principle is accepted, why can it not be done now?

It is equally true to say—although I did not at any time so advocate, and do not so advocate now—that the clauses on women's rights and aboriginal rights could be dealt with after patriation. Those matters were considered urgent, and so urgent that they ought to be included in the draft before us, and are so included—I certainly am glad to see them there—but if they could be included, so could the principle of general compensation. How can anything be more urgent than the preservation of Canada? Make no mistake about it, honourable senators, this amendment is aimed at improving the chance of preserving our country. It is aimed at removing, or, at least, lessening, the opportunity of the separatists, who argue that this whole constitutional document has the effect of isolating Quebec from the rest of Canada.

I agree, of course, that it is of no use whatsoever to try to convince the Premier of Quebec and his government to do anything, or to accept anything, which might be adverse to his and its avowed intention to separate from Canada—to destroy Canada as we know it. That would, indeed, be a foolish hope for us to spend any time upon. But it is a very different matter to avoid doing something which he would find useful, and which he would use in his efforts to convince the majority of the people of Quebec that Canada is not good for Quebec; that separatism is the thing that would be good for Quebec.

Honourable senators, I submit that if we leave things as they are, we will simply be giving Premier Lévesque a ground for argument he would dearly love to have, and love to have with some basis to back it up—a weapon to use against the federalists in that great province to the detriment of Canada and all Canadians. This amendment, if accepted, will help to avoid that. What possible reason can there be against adopting it now? What reason will outweigh the advantage of doing what we can to aid those who wish to preserve Canada? Is there anything better we could do than help those who are waging in Quebec the battle for Canada? Is there anything better that we could do to help those people than to avoid giving aid, comfort and weapons of argument to those who would destroy the country?

Surely, honourable senators, it would be very hard indeed for us to find a more worthy cause, a cause more deserving of our support, and a cause which, I submit, can be well served by adopting this amendment. If it is adopted, I think it will help to avoid giving that weapon to the separatist cause and will help, therefore, to advance the cause of those in Quebec willing to support, and desirous of fighting for, the cause of Canada there.

We will be wise to note, honourable senators—and to note well—that it is not only the separatists who are very unhappy not only with the way things are going, but the way they are now. Consider for a moment the attitude of Mr. Ryan, the Leader of the Liberal Party in Quebec and the Leader of the Opposition there. Mr. Ryan supported the adjournment of the National Assembly, the day before yesterday, as a form of protest against the adoption by the House of Commons of a constitutional resolution which has not the approval of the Province of Quebec. That is what he did. What did he say that day? What did this great advocate of federalism and friend of Canada say? I am sure he said it with a heavy heart and with great reluctance, but he said that he profoundly regrets “the fact that important decisions are taken in Ottawa that have not the support of the Province of Quebec.” Of course, Mr. Ryan was not alone. The Liberal members of the National Assembly stood with him on the question of the adjournment. Mr. Ryan and his supporters apparently have plenty of company.

I should like to read from an article of the Montreal Gazette on December 3. Under the headline “Sovereignty option favored in poll”, it goes on to say:

OTTAWA (UPC)—A poll sponsored by the federal government found—

Not a poll sponsored by the separatist government of Quebec, but a poll sponsored by the federal government.

—most Quebecers would have approved sovereignty-association for the province if a referendum had been held on the issue in September, a Toronto newspaper reported yesterday.

The story said the survey, conducted in September for the government's Canadian Unity Information Office, found that 53 per cent of Quebecers would have voted for limited sovereignty, up from 40 per cent in the Parti Quebecois government's referendum last year.

Justice Minister Jean Chrétien, who is responsible for the unity office, said yesterday he was unaware of any poll. Inquiries to the unity office were referred to Chrétien's office, which said it did not yet have enough information to confirm or comment on the story.

Apparently, the poll took place and, apparently, it is well known in Quebec, because, when watching the news on television last evening, I noted that the Premier of Quebec was interviewed on this very point. He tried to play it down for his own purposes, I suppose, and he said he had polls of his own which, in the context of the conversation, seemed to indicate to a listener—as it did to me, in any event—that he would rather pay attention to his own polls than to the federal polls.

• (1150)

Senator McElman: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Smith: Certainly.

Senator McElman: Is the honourable senator aware that it was reported in the media this morning that the same poll asked the question: “Do the people of Quebec support the Charter of Rights?”, and that approximately 70 per cent or more said yes?

Senator Smith: No, I was not aware of that, but it does not surprise me that such a poll was taken and that such an answer was received. I am not arguing against the Charter of Rights. I am arguing against doing something that gives the people of Quebec the feeling of isolation. I am also arguing for something that I believe will remove, or assist in removing, that feeling.

Mr. Ryan, as is well known, is a federalist, one who played a large and impressive part in persuading 60 per cent of the voters of Quebec to support the federalist cause and support the campaign for Canada in the referendum of 1980. No doubt

Mr. Ryan, however disappointed he may be with the federal government at present, will continue to work effectively for the cause of Canada if we give him something to work with, and refrain from giving his separatist opponents the weapons with which to fight him.

As one honourable senator said yesterday, it is indeed bitter irony that out of the promise of the Prime Minister, in that campaign of eighteen months ago, to reform the Constitution of Canada in order to help the people of Quebec attain their hopes and aspirations within the framework of Canada, there has resulted something that has divided rather than united, has discouraged rather than given hope and good cheer, and seems to be a weapon for separatism rather than an incentive to Canadianism.

Is it any wonder, then, that Mr. Ryan feels that, good Canadian though he is, he must join in the protest and the symbolism of protest of the separatist government of that great province?

I speak of symbolism. In these matters of deep and great emotion, symbolism is often more important than actuality, and perception more important than fact. Just now it is, I believe, true that the people of Quebec, federalists as well as others, perceive that what is being done is of vital importance to Quebec as well as to Canada.

Obviously, Mr. Ryan perceives it as an unfriendly act. If one places any reliance whatever on the poll I mentioned, a great many of the people of the province of Quebec perceive it the same way—according to the poll, 53 per cent of them, which is a large increase indeed from the 40 per cent who voted for separatism in the referendum of 18 months ago.

This amendment, if accepted, would do much to improve that unfortunate perception and would help to remove the feeling of isolation which clearly now is in the hearts and minds of many of the people of Quebec, federalists as well as others. Here, I submit, is a golden chance to strike a blow for Canada, and I urge all honourable senators to support the amendment.

Senator Frith: May I ask a question with regard to the amendment? Perhaps either Senator Smith or another honourable senator may be able to answer it. If I understood the honourable senator correctly, he described the amendment to section 40 as being simply a removal of that portion of the section which deals with the transfer of powers relating to education or other cultural matters from provincial legislatures.

Senator Smith: I am not sure that I described it in exactly that fashion, although it may come to the same thing. I believe it extends the principle of compensation for matters of education and other cultural matters to compensation of general application, when the transfer to Canada of provincial legislative powers takes place as a result of a change in the Constitution.

Senator Frith: I agree with that. But when I read Senator Roblin's amendment, it seemed to repeat what Senator Smith has just said. However, there is a little more to it than that, and I am not sure whether the amendment goes further than relating to education or other cultural matters. Perhaps an honourable senator will explain it, or perhaps Senator Roblin will do so if he decides to close the debate on this amendment. Unfortunately, I will not be able to intervene at that time as his remarks may have the effect of closing the debate.

[Senator Smith.]

The section itself says:

—to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

Senator Roblin, in drafting his amendment, said:

In the event that a province dissents from an amendment—

I wonder what his reason is for putting it that way. It indicates that there may be other ways in which an amendment would not apply other than because of a particular province's dissent. Senator Roblin also added the words:

—taking into account the per capita costs to exercise that jurisdiction in the provinces which have approved the amendment.

I am not suggesting that either of the changes is wrong. I merely want to know if they mean anything more than simply extending its scope beyond education and other cultural matters. Perhaps in the course of the debate someone will speak to that.

Senator Smith: I shall not attempt to speak for Senator Roblin or my leader on this matter, but when I drafted my remarks I had in mind certain things which perhaps bear upon the question.

Referring to the question of dissent, honourable senators will recall that this applies to an amendment made under section 38(1) which requires, as I believe I pointed out, the concurrence of two-thirds of the provinces—that means seven of the provinces—having 50 per cent of the population. Therefore, I would assume that seven provinces would have to agree with the amendment and, in consequence, would not be dissenters from it; that there could not be more than three provinces which did dissent and that the dissent would pinpoint up to three provinces who dissented from the views of the seven who were able to effect the amendment.

That was one point I had in mind. Regarding my other point, in section 40 the compensation is referred to as "reasonable compensation". The amendment says:

—taking into account the per capita costs to exercise that jurisdiction—

It seems to me that this is somewhat more explicit in stating what is "reasonable compensation," because I cannot conceive of any compensation being reasonable unless it took into account the per capita costs to exercise that jurisdiction. It might also take into consideration other things, but that is what I had in mind when framing my comments. Perhaps Senator Roblin or the Leader of the Opposition will add to that.

● (1200)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think that could easily be the explanation for the second part, and that Senator Roblin is simply saying that it is still a matter of reasonable compensation, but that he wants to be sure that one of the things that is taken into account in determining reasonable compensation is the per capita cost of exercising that jurisdiction in the province which approved the amendment. That makes sense to me.

With regard to the other point, perhaps it is a question of draftsmanship. It also may be a question of my splitting hairs. It occurs to me, however, that the draftsmanship in clause 40 is a little less restrictive, since it seems to me that it is possible, or would be possible, to argue that an amendment would not apply to certain provinces without their active dissension. It may be just a matter of draftsmanship, and I am grateful to Senator Smith for giving me his reaction to my two questions. Perhaps someone else will address the matter in the course of the debate. It is not really a very big matter, but I would like it to be clear.

Senator Flynn: I could tell the deputy leader that if the government is prepared to move another amendment apart from ours, but fulfilling the same objectives, we will give him leave to do that, and will withdraw ours immediately.

Senator Frith: I am very grateful for that offer, but I was merely seeking information. If I speak on this amendment I want to be sure that I understand it.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is a quarter past twelve.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, I shall not be more than five minutes. I gather we do not adjourn until 12.30.

Some Hon. Senators: Go ahead.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, on October 14, 1980, I had some harsh words to say in relation to the federal government and its proposed constitutional resolution. Much of my concern was caused by the lack of interest in two urgent problems facing Newfoundland and Labrador. I am happy now that both the problem of the export of Labrador hydro power and the problem of the offshore oil resources of Newfoundland are receiving serious and favourable consideration, and that steps are being taken towards solving both problems in a way which will be beneficial to both Canada and the Province of Newfoundland. Any special reason I might have had, therefore, to oppose any constitutional amendments, no longer exists.

Honourable senators, the resolution we are now considering is much different from, and much improved in comparison with, the original resolution. A very positive improvement is that the federal government has been diverted from following a more or less unilateral course of action. Thanks to the debates in both this chamber and the House of Commons the government has recognized that Canada is a federal state, and that fact has been confirmed by the Supreme Court.

Another great improvement is that all parties now agree that a reasonable consensus must exist for this and all future amendments. We now have a substantial, although, sadly, not complete, consensus. Here I should point out that I fully agree with Senator Robichaud when he says that because of a reasonable amending formula no door will be closed for all time against any group or any province.

Senator Flynn: How do you know?

Senator Cook: The way is always open in the future whereby, if parties come to a federal-provincial conference with hearts and minds dedicated to reaching an agreement, an agreement will be reached, and the Constitution will be amended in a fair, just and honourable way, which is, I am sure, the Canadian way.

As I have said on many occasions, I am not one of those who are overjoyed with the Charter of Rights, or with the consequent move away from the supremacy of each parliament in its own jurisdiction in favour of giving the final word to the courts. However, there now exists a consensus on this issue, and I think I should accept it, particularly as enacting improvements to the Constitution will be a continuing process, and therefore, in the future, as I have said, amendments may be considered and adopted in Canada.

Therefore, I will vote for the resolution, because it has now been produced in a democratic way, with a federal consensus.

Senator Flynn: You are speaking now from the point of view of Newfoundland, evidently.

Senator Cook: I speak from the point of view of Canada.

The document is not perfect, of course, but if we insist on perfection we shall remain stalled forever, because no two men, and certainly no two women, will agree on what is perfection.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 2.10 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

STUDENTS FROM SMITHS FALLS COLLEGIATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at 1.15 this afternoon I gave a short talk on the Senate to a group of students and their teacher, Bob Sneyd, from the Smiths Falls Collegiate. Smiths Falls is a neighbouring town to Perth in the County of Lanark, the county whose name serves as my designation in this chamber.

I see those students filing into the gallery, and wish to draw their presence to the attention of honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, in viewing this resolution I find myself somewhat ambivalent, because I think that the process of its maturation over the last year or two has both improved it and created some very real problems for this country. I have to say that I am not entirely happy with the final result but that I will vote for it, and I will try to explain to you why.

Such a resolution could be arrived at only in Canada. We take pride, in Canada, that the hallmark of our political negotiations is compromise, that compromise is "the Canadian way". I think, however, that this is a quality that we should not elevate too highly. This resolution is a product of what I would call intransigence on the part of the provinces of Canada, because, in an attempt to increase their provincial powers, for some considerable length of time they refused to agree to an amending formula. The resolution is the product of the desire of a Prime Minister for patriation of the Constitution and for a charter of rights. The result is this compromise.

I am mystified as to how, throughout this process, people were able to say that Mr. Trudeau was inflexible. In my view, he is about as inflexible as a boa constrictor. It seems to me that anybody who is going to be Prime Minister of Canada has to be a flexible person. Historically, the only Prime Minister I can recall being inflexible was Arthur Meighen, who, in his own words, was "unrevised, unrepentant" and, for the most part, unelected.

What worries me is that through this resolution we may have weakened Confederation rather than strengthened it. It is my belief that in Canada we need a strong central government. I am opposed to the thought that we are "a community of communities." We are not, as a recent Senate report said, a collection of eleven sovereign governments. We are a collection of eleven governments, but one is more sovereign than the other ten.

Upon examination of this resolution, one will notice such things as the fact that there is no property rights section. I understand that it is not included in the resolution because it would constitute an interference with property and civil rights, which honourable senators know have been within the ambit of authority of the provinces. It seems to me, however, that one of the hallmarks of a free society is the right to own property. Contrary to what a lot of leftist people think, I believe that economic freedom generally precedes and assures political freedom.

If one looks at the equalization section, one will see that it requires equalization of public services to a "reasonably comparable" level. At present, it is, largely, to a "reasonably adequate" level. In fact, 50 per cent of petroleum revenues are not taken into the equalization formula, because that would create a situation in which the cost to the federal government of bringing equalization to a comparable level would be more than the federal government could afford. This may turn out to be a danger when we try to emulate across Canada the level of public services that are available in some of the oil-rich provinces of this country.

I must say, honourable senators, that there are specific areas of the resolution that concern me. Take, for example, section 23(1)(a). It is a fact that somebody who has learned and understands a minority official language in a province can, in all provinces except Quebec, have his or her children educated in that minority language. This section does not apply to Quebec unless the Quebec Legislature chooses that it should. We have restricted mobility rights where the employment rate in a province is below that of the national employment rate. It seems to me that it could take a long and painful time to establish and develop the jurisprudence in respect of the definition of aboriginal rights and in respect of the conflicts that may exist between section 28 and section 15 relating to women's rights.

We have, included in the Charter of Rights, a "notwithstanding" section. In it we say that a provincial legislature or the federal Parliament can override equality, fundamental and legal rights by passing a "notwithstanding" section in an act or in a provision of an act and by renewing it every five years. I happen to view that as an improvement in the process. It is true that justices of the Supreme Court of the United States have indicated that their Supreme Court does follow public opinion. We can likely expect that our Supreme Court would do the same thing. Court decisions, however, can create an inflexibility that would be very difficult to cure. I think the "notwithstanding" clause has very much improved the operation of the Charter of Rights in those three areas.

• (1420)

I think the resolution was further improved by substituting the Vancouver formula for the Victoria formula. The Vancouver formula states that the Constitution can be amended by the agreement of the Parliament of Canada and seven provinces comprising 50 per cent of the population. Although I consider the Vancouver formula a great improvement, there is one part of it that bothers me greatly. That is the right of the three remaining provinces to opt out of the constitutional change. I suggest to you, honourable senators, that that is a most unwise provision in the resolution. I am only repeating others when I say that it could lead to a checkerboard Canada and to incremental separatism, and I believe, to use Mr. Trudeau's own words, that it denies the existence of a national will.

It has been said that the denial of financial compensation will tend to prevent those three provinces from opting out. In my opinion, that is really cold comfort. As Senator Roblin pointed out, most of the shared-cost programs in which there is fiscal compensation did not require a constitutional amendment. Already in the Charter it states that, if the amendment involves cultural or educational rights, compensation will be paid. It is my understanding that Mr. Serge Joyal has already stated that one of the first things to be done after this Constitution is brought to Canada is to amend the compensation clause so that, regardless of the amendment, compensation will be paid.

There is also the argument that constitutional amendments will not occur very often; that they have not occurred very often in the past. Well, I do not find much comfort in that either. As a matter of fact, the opting-out provision may well make it more difficult to amend the Constitution, if it is known in advance that certain provinces might not go along with the amendment.

Senator Flynn: Do you prefer the Victoria Charter?

Senator Everett: No, I do not prefer the Victoria Charter. The Vancouver Charter is much better.

Senator Flynn: Well, what you have been referring to is the Vancouver Charter.

Senator Everett: The Vancouver Charter involves a much fairer way of amending the Constitution. However, that is not to say that the Vancouver Charter had to have an opting-out provision. I am against any formula that has an opting-out provision, because I think it is wrong and that we will live to regret it. I think it is a most unwise move.

Having said that, I still find myself in the position of supporting this resolution.

Senator Flynn: This is not surprising.

Senator Everett: I do so for two reasons. The first is that, indeed, the Constitution can now be amended. The second is that, in my opinion, this must not go back to the provinces, because, if it does go back into negotiation, I fear that we will have even greater decentralization in Canada than we have today.

For those reasons, honourable senators, as unattractive as many parts of this resolution are to me, I believe it has to be supported.

[Translation]

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Flynn:

That Section 59 of the proposed Constitution Act 1981 be amended as follows:

(a) by substituting, in the first line of subsection (1), the words "Paragraphs 23(1)(a), 23(1)(b) and subsections 23(2) and 23(3)" for the words "Paragraph 23(1)(a)";

(b) by substituting, in the second line of subsection (3), the words "Paragraph 23(1)(a) or 23(1)(b) or subsection 23(2) or 23(3)" for the words "paragraph 23(1)(a)".

Honourable senators, I imagine that the meaning of the amendment as drafted is not immediately clear. That is why you have to read the section which I propose to amend. As indicated in the proposed amendment it is Section 59. Here is how it reads.

59. (1) Paragraph 23(1)(a) shall come into force in respect of Quebec on a day to be fixed by proclamation issued by the Queen or the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada.

(2) A proclamation under subsection (1) shall be issued only where authorized by the legislative assembly or government of Quebec.

(3) This section may be repealed on the day paragraph 23(1)(a) comes into force in respect of Quebec and this Act amended and renumbered, consequential upon the repeal of this section, by proclamation issued by the Queen or the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada.

So the intent of my amendment is to extend to each and every provision of Section 23 that part of Section 59 which applies to only one subsection of Section 23. Therefore we will refer to Section 23 to understand the precise meaning of Section 59 itself and the wider application which I am proposing. Section 23 has to do with the language of instruction and reads as follows:

23. (1) Citizens of Canada

(a) whose first language learned and still understood is that of the English or French linguistic minority population of the province in which they reside, or

(b) who have received their primary school instruction in Canada in English or French and reside in a province where the language in which they received that instruction is the language of the English or French linguistic minority population of the province,

Those citizens of Canada—

have the right to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in that language in that province.

I would not want to make an unfair comparison, but it is almost as easy to understand as my amendment is. Here now is Section 23(2):

(2) Citizens of Canada of whom any child has received or is receiving primary or secondary school instruction in English or French in Canada, have the right to have all their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the same language.

I think there is no need to read the third subsection. It can be easily summed up since it provides that the rights which have just been described apply only where numbers warrant.

So that is Section 23 as it reads now and the amendment I propose. Under Section 59 Quebec remains free to choose the date the mother tongue criterion will come into force. There is an explanation. I think it should be pointed out that we have here an amendment that is an improvement over the initial draft. The explanation is as follows: In Quebec people went through the painful experience of Bill 22 which was passed under the Bourassa government, and which was concerned with rating French or English language knowledge as a prerequisite for admission to French or English schools.

This led to the test "horror stories". You may have read in the press at the time about the problems caused by this test criterion which included an evaluation of the knowledge of the language involved, that is, French or English. By including the mother tongue criterion, the draft resolution was again raising the problems caused by Bill 22. This is clear if we read Section 23(1)(a) carefully, and I shall read it again to prevent any misunderstanding:

(a) whose first language learned and still understood is that of the . . . minority

How is one supposed to establish, without using some kind of test, that the first language learned is still understood? In any case, according to this formula there was still a possibility that some kind of test would have to be used.

I think this was pointed out several times, and the Canadian government, I suppose in agreement with the other First Ministers who had signed the Accord on November 5, decided to include another clause in the draft resolution which, to all intents and purposes, does not reinstate the mother tongue criterion and merely uses the parents' language of instruction, which is a simple fact that can be checked without a test. In this respect, Bill 101 was an improvement over Bill 22.

This fact was therefore recognized, and the automatic application of the mother tongue criterion was taken out of Section 23. Thus, it will be up to the Government of Quebec or the National Assembly to reinstate that criterion, if experience shows that is desirable. Meanwhile, the criterion for minority language education in Quebec will be the language of instruction.

I feel the meaning is now quite clear. The objective of the amendment I am proposing is to reinstate and to maintain, for Quebec, the situation with respect to language of instruction that prevailed in all provinces at the time of the conference at the beginning of November.

At that time, all provinces were entitled to decide freely whether Section 23 would apply to their jurisdictions. On November 5, the provinces freely decided to exercise that right by agreeing to have this article apply to their jurisdictions.

One province, Manitoba, signed the general Accord with a very significant qualification clause which appears in the margin next to the signature of the representative for Manitoba. The clause appearing on the Accord document reads as follows:

● (1430)

[English]

Subject to approval of section 3(c) by the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba.

[Translation]

The section 3(c) referred to is section 3(c) of the Accord. That section is the one that refers to section 23 of the resolution, dealing with educational rights. This means that right now, under the November 5 agreement, that part of the Accord is not yet in force. The qualification to Manitoba's agreement to that section providing for legislative assembly approval means that this is not yet in force. The Manitoba assembly is still free either to concur or not with section 23.

Based on the principle that the other provinces already exercised their freedom of choice by signing the agreement, Manitoba's signature will be equivalent to those of the eight other provinces if and when the legislative assembly do so decide. Unless in the meantime the government itself waives that qualification. But, so long as such a waiver does not come, this is Manitoba's current status.

This will be the case until the constitutional act comes into force, which will happen under section 8 by proclamation issued by the Queen or the Governor General of Canada. In the meantime, if it so happens that Manitoba's legislative assembly or government decide to join the eight other provinces, proclamation will not impose section 23 on Manitoba. But if by proclamation date Quebec has not concurred with section 23, as far as language is concerned, with section 23 as a whole, well, proclamation will impose section 23 on Quebec, except the paragraph referred to in section 59, except the paragraph concerning the mother tongue criterion. Such is the status.

I will deal further with section 59. It was quoted earlier, but some comments might be worthwhile. First, I should stress the transitional nature of section 59. As soon as Quebec's legislative assembly, the National Assembly decided to implement the mother tongue criterion in its jurisdiction section 59 becomes obsolete. In that respect, my proposal changes nothing to the transitional nature of the section. The day either one of the clauses in section 23 is authorized or concurred with by the National Assembly, on that day section 59 will apply transitionally and will be repealed in whole or in part.

I see that Senator Frith is shaking his head. Is that about the meaning of what I just described about the transitional nature that is maintained, even if we extend section 59?

Senator Frith: As I understand the terms of paragraph 3, it is stated that this section may be repealed. Am I right in understanding your opinion is that this is automatic as of that date, or becomes obsolete as of that date?

Senator Tremblay: I accept the correction, the slight difference in meaning. It is not automatically obsolete, but it is something similar in my view; which means that to all practical purposes it will be repealed because it will serve no useful purposes. This leads me to submit it has a transitional nature, and to dissipate any possible confusion, I would stress that the addition of the other clauses in section 23 does not change that transitional nature.

Senator Frith: Obsolete instead of repealed, if my understanding is right.

Honorable Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, on a point of order. Under what Senator Tremblay just suggested as far as Manitoba's signature of the agreement is concerned, the reason it was done this way is simply that the Manitoba government was waiting for the results of the provincial election.

Senator Flynn: No, not at all.

Senator Guay: Let me conclude. Since that time, the newly elected Manitoba premier let it be known he was supporting the other provinces that signed the Accord. I want to clarify that, in view of the point raised by Mr. Tremblay. Thank you.

Senator Tremblay: I did not ask myself what motives Manitoba could have had on November 5 for including this qualification. Its signature was made conditional to the Legislative Assembly's agreement. The motive may be what Senator Guay claims it is but the actual situation brought about by this qualification in the agreement is as I have described. You say that the new premier has indicated his agreement or his consent. I believe that what I said did not exclude this possibility.

In my opinion, there is no indication that this was done officially, but let us leave that aside. The case of Manitoba will be settled in this way, and I believe that even if the new Premier of Manitoba were to express his adhesion to the agreement positively, in a manner comparable to the signature of the others, it would only confirm my interpretation of the events, that the eight provinces, or rather the nine if Manitoba joins the others, have exercised their freedom of choice. Whether there are eight or nine makes no difference to my basic argument.

My amendment aims at giving back to Quebec the freedom of choice which all the others had and which would disappear because of Section 23 and the very specific character of section 59. That is my point. Regarding section 59 and its provisional nature, my amendment does not change anything. What the amendment does is to make the freedom of choices of the Quebec National Assembly apply not only to a specific clause, namely that of the maternal tongue, but to every part of clause 23.

Why did I use an enumeration in my amendment rather than saying, seemingly quite simply, section 23 in its entirety? There is a very concrete and very specific reason for this; as you know, subsection 3 of section 23 establishes the principle of where numbers warrant it.

However, this criterion was never used in Quebec in relation with the English-speaking minority. It seems to me that the Quebec National Assembly should at least be free not to apply a criterion which was never used in the past, and that is the paradox of the situation, that section 23 imposes a restriction to Quebec anglophones that Quebec itself has never used. You must admit that is a paradox for the Quebec anglophones. This is why I make an enumeration. The National Assembly could very well say that subsection 3 does not apply and that another provision does apply. You see the latitude that this enumeration provides while an apparently more simple formulation would not be as flexible, especially on a point such as this one.

[English]

Senator Godfrey: I would ask the honourable senator, on that very point concerning Quebec, if there are any places in the province of Quebec where there are English schools and where the numbers do not warrant them.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: If we may have a little history lesson, neither the Public Education Act, which is the blueprint legislation for the establishment of school boards, nor Bill 101 refer to numbers warranting a school or not.

This has always been left to the discretion of school commissioners or trustees of the minority group. The Public Education Act provides that the decision is left to the board of trustees, which may be Catholic or Protestant, depending on the minority. Whenever there are 12 dissenting families, I believe, these families may set up a board of trustees.

Most boards of trustees were established—pursuant to the legislation of 1846, if my memory serves me right. In this regard, Senator Flynn may have more accurate information, but as I recall, this system was really established by the legislation of 1846, about 20 years before Confederation.

Perhaps this goes as far back as 1824, but I cannot say for sure. The present system was certainly in place in 1846 and perhaps somewhat earlier. There is therefore no provision in Quebec legislation concerning the number of children needed to warrant a school.

Paradoxically, it was the members of the Protestant school boards, the minority group, who became aware of the need to group schools. They did so nearly 20 years before the Catholics. It may be because in their own judgment, the number of Protestant families was too low, especially in certain rural areas, so there appeared to be a need to group schools. At the request of the minority, an Act called the Act for the Protestant School Boards was passed in 1945 or 1946. I wish to emphasize this point. It was not the Parliament or the legislature of Quebec which wrote up the requirements for this system and even less a charter. Schools were grouped because of the perceptions of the minority administrators. I imagine that Ontario francophones have read these texts because they are asking that the Catholic minority in Ontario be treated in the same way as the Protestant minority in Quebec as far as the administration of their own schools is concerned. Just as Section 93 guarantees the rights of minorities on the basis of religion rather than that of language, the Quebec legislation provides the right to dissidence on the basis of religion. I believe that this should be mentioned.

What has happened? The Protestants in Quebec have had their schools and their school boards. However, for nearly 100 years, the francophone minority within the Protestant groups has not had its French schools. This issue was addressed only following the report of the Judge Tremblay Commission, as it was called. In the course of my work for this commission, I was shocked to discover that francophones within the Protestant minority in Quebec did not get French language schools until the 50s.

What was happening, meanwhile, on the Catholic side? The Catholics, who were in a majority, allowed the anglophone minority to have its own complete primary and secondary system. The legislation contains no obligation in this regard, because as I said earlier, it establishes the principle of dissent, and therefore the right to establish schools, only on the basis of religious denomination. On the Protestant side, the franco-phone minority did not get schools, although there have been Protestant francophones in Quebec for a long time. On the Catholic side, Francophones allowed Catholic anglophones to have their own schools. I think this is the point that should be stressed, and today, when people are demanding that Quebec should have the right to be autonomous in this field, we should remember history has shown that threats to the minority have been considerably exaggerated by some people.

I should like to take a closer look at Section 23. I may point out that Section 59 acknowledges the principle that Quebec's National Assembly will decide when part of Section 23, namely the part concerned with the mother tongue criterion, will apply. Whether part or all of the section is concerned has no bearing on whether or not the principle exists. My amendment proposes to extend the principle to all of Section 23.

It would perhaps be useful to review Section 23 to see at least some of what I would call paradoxical effects. The application of 23(1)(a) is, pursuant to Section 59, left to the National Assembly to decide. We can assume that the National Assembly will not decide first thing tomorrow morning to reinstate the mother tongue criterion, in view of past experience in this respect. What remained, therefore, was the criterion of the parents' language of instruction. Let us read it or, rather, let us read it again.

Citizens of Canada . . . who have received their primary school instruction in Canada in English or French and reside in a province—

Because we mean Quebec, let us say “in the province of Quebec”.

—in which they received that instruction—

Because the linguistic minority population in Quebec is English, let us say “English”.

—have the right to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in that language in that province.

What does the Canada clause mean to anglophones who reside in Quebec and who received their primary school instruction outside Canada? They have no longer the right to send their children to English schools in Quebec, under this Canada clause. On this, Bill 101 is more lenient. Section 73 of Bill 101 states:

—may receive their instruction in English at the request of their father and mother—

I had better skip the first paragraph, for it is irrelevant to my argument. What is quite relevant indeed is paragraph (b):

The children whose father or mother, on the date this act comes into force, is domiciled in Quebec, has received his or her primary school instruction in English outside Quebec . . .

Well, outside Quebec, that means also in other countries.

In this respect, the Canada clause has reduced this group of anglophones' rights to school instruction in their own language. I emphasized that a while ago, but I repeat it now. On the other hand, Subclause 3 which deals with “Application where numbers warrant” is essentially a step backward in comparison with what we have known in the past—

[Senator Tremblay.]

● (1450)

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Senator Tremblay, would you accept three questions? My first question concerns education which, in your opinion, should come under the jurisdiction of the Quebec legislature without it being guaranteed by the Constitution, or are you defending the rights of anglophones who will eventually become Canadian citizens? I find it hard to reconcile your two positions. According to you, should eventual immigrants be protected rather than Quebec minorities? Do you feel that Section 23 would deprive eventual anglophone immigrants of the rights they already enjoy under Bill 101?

This is somewhat of a contrast, but this I think I can understand. Would you agree that immigrants that would come from English-speaking countries in the future will have more rights than other immigrants from countries such as Poland, Italy, France? Would you be ready to consider two classes of immigrants?

Thirdly, if your amendment was agreed to, would Quebec give its consent?

Senator Tremblay: Senator Rizzuto, I would like to clear up the confusion in your mind. My intent at this time is not to amend Bill 101. If you want to have a specific answer to your question, Bill 101 does not make two classes of immigrants. I am not adding to Bill 101. I simply show how paradoxical are the Canada clause as drafted in Section 23 as well as certain aspects of Bill 101, in which part of the minority is better treated than under Section 23. If I may ask you to be a little more patient, the conclusion of my analysis, I think will show this clearly at the end of my comments.

I therefore repeat what I was saying earlier that the “where the number warrants” clause has also restricted the rights of anglophones in Quebec since in that province no such provision has ever been enacted in a piece of legislation or has ever been embodied in a concrete measure. Now, if one looks at it from the point of view of that category of anglophones being better treated under Bill 101 than under the Canada clause in Section 23, or from the point of view of the anglophones who were never subjected to the “where the number warrants” clause, I think one may conclude that for English-speaking Quebecers, the Charter is a backward step, even in relation to Bill 101. I think some of them have become more and more aware of it.

The Canada clause contained in Section 23 is more beneficial, more generous than Bill 101 only to anglophones coming to Quebec from other Canadian provinces. That is the bottom line. That will be the result if Section 23 is imposed as drafted. I did say “as drafted”. Had everything not been botched up throughout the entire process, it would have been possible and rather simple to draft section 23 so as to take such problems into account. It would have been possible also to solve certain problems which Bill 101 does not solve. For instance, the problems of the descendants of English-speaking Quebecers who are entitled to an English education but who are open minded towards Quebec and choose to send their children to French schools; mark me, "English-speaking Quebecers who choose to send their children to French schools".

As drafted Bill 101 does away with the right of those children because they will not have been educated in the language of the minority, that is English, but in French. It would be easy enough to draft a text which would state quite simply that the right of those children to attend English schools can be extended to their descendants even if they did not exercise it themselves. The right is not changed because it is exercised but, once it is established, it remains valid.

In short, it would have been possible to do things much more constructively. All things considered, if I were an English-speaking Quebecer, I would rather not have that section forced upon Quebec. Instead I would opt for the principle already recognized under section 59(1).

● (1500)

Senator Frith: But now that does not apply to future immigrants, does it?

Senator Tremblay: I do not know, the question of immigrants is something else. To my mind, however, the main thing is that section 59(1) does acknowledge the principle that the National Assembly makes the decision, as the other provinces have done, I mean the governments. This principle from which my proposition flows, extends to the entire section 23 the right of self-determination of Quebec's National Assembly. Quebec has the right, as do the other provinces, to decide on its own how to apply section 23. That section was not forced on the other provinces; they accepted it of their own free will on November 5. If I refer to Senator Guay's remarks, perhaps Manitoba has accepted it freely in recent days. In all fairness, it should be the same for Quebec. That is the unequivocal and clear purpose of my proposed amendment to section 59.

Senator Rizzuto: Honorable senators, I think that I was the first one in this house to rise and contest section 23 in the original resolution. I agree with the first part of Senator Tremblay's speech to the effect that section 23 1(a) of this resolution would have been hard to implement in Quebec. I addressed the issue and I think that one can read my speech in Hansard of October 27, 1980. I will always remember the date because it was very important for me to state that we could not keep section 23 as it was first presented. I certainly agree that that part of section 23 cannot be implemented, that we have already had problems with Quebec's Bill 22. But when senator Tremblay says that subsection B is not acceptable because only those Canadians who have received their primary education either in the French or the English minority school system are entitled to send their children to those minority language schools which they have themselves attended. Besides, I think we should first protect the rights of our fellow Canadian citizens before concerning ourselves with the immigrants who will be coming here eventually.

I think, Senator Tremblay, that you and I are upholding the rights of Quebecers; that is what I keep trying to do, because I am a Quebecer myself, but I also have to take into account the interests of all Canadians and of minority groups, whether they be French or English, inside or outside Quebec.

With respect to the two issues that you raise, if your amendment were to be accepted and with Quebec having authority over the educational rights of Quebecers, are you aware that the rights of the English-speaking Quebecers would not be guaranteed if ever the Quebec government were to prevent them from attending English schools? There would be no one then to ensure that their rights are secured.

I personally prefer to guarantee the rights of those new Canadians who are here now, rather than think of the future, that is the Australians, Americans or others who will come to this country in ten years time.

If I look at it as an immediate concern, then I cannot agree with the amendment. I must protect the minorities, whether they be the francophones outside Quebec or the anglophones within Quebec, but protect the anglophones in Canada I must and not the anglophones of other countries who may emigrate here in the future.

Again I put my last question to Senator Tremblay: Would it lead to an agreement with Quebec because, if it did, then perhaps I could vote for it. Can you answer that question for me?

Senator Frith: Is the honourable senator putting a question that requires an answer or is it just a rhetorical question which forms part of his speech? Am I to understand that this will not bring the debate on the amendment to a close?

[English]

● (1510)

Senator Roblin: You cannot terminate it.

Senator Frith: Only on the amendment.

Senator Roblin: It is an amendment to the main motion.

Senator Frith: He has the right to terminate it.

Senator Roblin: No, he doesn't; on an amendment you do not get a second chance.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: That is a big question mark. It seems to me there was a big question mark in the tone of Senator Rizzuto and in the contents of his question. May I reply to Senator Rizzuto since in fact he was asking a question? If I understood Senator Rizzuto correctly, he wanted to know whether or not the Quebec government would agree.

Quite frankly, I do not know; but it seems to me that whether or not the Quebec government agrees is not important; what counts is the fact that the action I am suggesting, is justified, namely a freedom enjoyed by others, which Quebec will lose through the restoration of taxation.

I'd like to ask one question maybe to clear—

[English]

Senator Godfrey: May I ask a question of the honourable senator to clear up any misunderstanding? Possibly the interpretation was not correct. The way it came through to me was that the honourable senator said that the Charter would reduce the rights that people have under Bill 101. Does the honourable senator mean that in Quebec they could not be more generous than is provided for in the Charter, or does he mean the legal rights, because they can still go further in Bill 101 than is provided for in the Charter. I merely want to clear up that point.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, section 23, as I read it, reduces the rights already existing for anglophones in Quebec. If the honourable senator reads the comments of some of the anglophones, he will find that they have read it the same way as I have.

Senator Godfrey: Would it be illegal for Bill 101 to continue to give more rights to the anglophones in Quebec than are provided for in the Charter? That is what I am trying to make clear. I realize that in certain respects they do not have as many rights guaranteed under the Charter as they actually have under Bill 101, but they can still keep those rights under Bill 101; is that not so?

Senator Flynn: That is a good question.

Senator Tremblay: That is a question, the answer to which will come in time. In a sense that is a legal question, and I will not dare to go too far. Would it be illegal for Quebec to apply the Charter as it is? Would the Charter prevail over everything else? The question is hypothetical. In fact, Quebec has never acted toward its minority just within the limits of section 23. And in a sense it raises a problem. If in the past we had behaved as other provinces have behaved, so much so that the "numbers warranting" rule would be required for Quebec as well as for those provinces that have asked for it, we would not have any problem of consistency with the Charter.

To solve that problem, to keep the numbers warranting for other provinces and to retain the Quebec tradition, we have to write two clauses. That is another aspect of the special character of Quebec. In that case it is a character of generosity. I cannot impose generosity on Ontario, but I would not like to become less generous, which could be the effect of section 23.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have passed a note to Senator Tremblay. I believe there is a typographical error in the last line of his amendment. It should read "23(2)" rather than "23(c)".

Senator Tremblay: That's right.

Senator Frith: That will be corrected. I have the same difficulty as Senator Godfrey, namely, that the legal question does not seem to me to be that subtle. If the position taken by Senator Tremblay is that Bill 101 is more generous than the Canada clause to the anglophone minority in Quebec, because such a bill does not exist elsewhere, then I cannot see that 23(1)(b)—which of course, applies to provinces other than Quebec and will apply also to Quebec, since it is not subject to the so-called opting-out provision—will reduce any rights. That may indeed be a question of some legal complexity. However, in my view the basic rule is that such sections would always be interpreted in a generous way, namely, to create rights rather than to limit rights.

It might be worthwhile for me to say a word on the amendment. As to sections 59 and 23, it is my understanding and conviction that the minority language education rights that go into effect immediately—and I do not believe we disagree on this—are the "Canada" section, section 23(1)(b), and the continuation of education rights or the "if any, then all" clause, which is section 23(2). The mother tongue test applies elsewhere, but does not apply in Quebec unless Quebec says so.

● (1520)

I also understood that the reason for that was the same as that given by Senator Rizzuto, namely, that section 23(1)(a) creates complications in Quebec. Perhaps some of the complications are the ones that Senator Tremblay has outlined for us.

I would not have any trouble understanding, before his speech or after his speech, why Senator Tremblay would support the fact that Section 23(1)(a) should not go into effect until it gets approval in Quebec; but I cannot understand why he would not want those other sections to come into effect, because it seems to me that from the point of view not just of Quebec, but from the overall point of view—and what we are looking at here is a Constitution for all of Canada—these two sections, namely the ones that stay in effect, 23(1)(b) and 23(2), provide the minimum of reciprocity between Quebec and the other provinces. Unless I misunderstood, the Government of Quebec itself acknowledged this as desirable in the St. Andrews 1977 and Montreal 1978 agreements with the other provinces, and that such provision was included in Bill 101. In fact, unless I am assigning it to a different conference, it seems to me that it was at the 1977 St. Andrews conference that Premier Lévesque made a pretty strong point when he said, "Don't talk to me about these rights until we can talk about reciprocity," and it seems to me that the reciprocity exists in the application of the two clauses, namely the "Canada" clause, and the "if any, then all" or "continuing education" clause.

In fact, it seems to me that the resolution we are debating here does little more than give effect to section 86 of Bill 101. That has been something that Quebec was unable to do, because the consent of the other provinces was a prior requirement—that is, they could not do it across the board. That consent has now been achieved through the Charter of Rights.

It seems to me that those two clauses should be perfectly acceptable to Quebec as they now stand, and that in fact they reflect a principle of reciprocity that I understood the Quebec government itself has always favoured. The Charter that we are looking at also, of course, gives Quebec the right to opt into constitutional provisions protecting the language and education rights of citizens according to their mother tongue if they decide that that does not create unnecessary complications. If they do not want it to apply, it need not apply.

It seems to me, therefore, that the positive parts of it are what they themselves have always wanted. They are positive because Quebec has said in the past that they are positive and desirable. They say, "We have problems with 23(1)(a)," and we say, "All right; it does not apply." So the constitutional resolution does nothing more than protect the minority language of education rights, which the PQ government itself has already approved in principle and for which it has made its own legal provision. This, therefore, it seems to me, in no way threatens Quebec's cultural and linguistic heritage. On the contrary, it strengthens and protects the cultural and linguistic heritage of French Canada as a whole, and not just that of Quebec. That is something that I understood the Quebec government was in favour of.

In that way it confirms and extends to other provinces the principles of fairness towards linguistic minorities, namely, those very principles of fairness which have been, I thought, the cornerstone of the position of the present Quebec government throughout these previous conferences.

Senator Smith: I wonder if I could ask Senator Frith a question with relation to what he has just been saying. I hasten to say that I do not pretend for a moment to be competent to discuss with him the relative provisions in Bill 101 and this.

My question is: Did he take into consideration, in expressing his views, the provisions of section 32(1)(b) of the draft resolution? Section 32(1) begins "This Charter applies..." and then continues in (b):

(b) to the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

It would seem to me at first reading that that simply means that no matter what the legislature of the province may say, the provisions of this document apply, and supersede any legislation of the province which deals with the same subject.

Senator Frith: I think that would be true if it were not for section 59. It is section 59 that specifically says that section 23(1)(a) is not to apply until Quebec approves it.

Senator Smith: Yes, I understand that.

Senator Frith: So the Charter, generally, applies to all legislatures, as Senator Smith has pointed out, but the Charter includes section 59, and that exempts Quebec from 23(1)(a). As I understand it, Senator Tremblay wants section 59 to apply to all of it.

Senator Flynn: That is, to all or part.

Senator Frith: Yes; but in his amendment he wants to include 23(1)(a), which is not now included. Clause 59 now includes 23(1)(a), but he says he does not want the "Canada" clause to apply in Quebec unless Quebec agrees, and that he does not want what is sometimes called the "continuing education", or "continuity of instruction" clause—although I think it is better described as the "if any, then all" clause—because that is what it says. If one child takes the education and qualifies, then all other children can qualify too. What Senator Tremblay is saying, I think—and that is what I tried to make my remarks relate to on the amendment—is that not only should 23(1)(a), which many people think creates complications in Quebec, not apply unless Quebec agrees, but that the other clauses should not apply either. My position, in essence, is that those clauses have in them the principles that Quebec has always supported, namely, reciprocity and continuity of education, if I am to believe what they have said at other conferences. That is where Senator Tremblay and I differ.

● (1530)

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on the amendment which I seconded.

Senator Marshall: Sure, take as long as you want.

Senator Flynn: I shall not take more time than you are prepared to give me. My first point is that in the agreement of November 5 last each province that signed it accepted for itself section 23. That was a voluntary agreement. The provinces were not bound to agree. No province said, "I will accept it if another province accepts it." Each province accepted it for itself. As was mentioned, even Manitoba agreed, subject to the approval of the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba, which indicates that the federal government, for its part, was willing to accept this conditional Accord as far as Manitoba was concerned. The federal government was not imposing this clause upon any of the signatories.

It is only upon Quebec that, by force, section 23 is imposed. The federal government did not dare impose section 133 upon Ontario. Nothing contained in this Charter was imposed upon any province, yet this section and the amending formula, which has been mentioned, are imposed upon Quebec. We say that if the provinces were free, at the time of the Accord, to accept the application of section 23, Quebec should be free to accept it as well. That is the basis of the amendment which would make this section subject to the adoption by the National Assembly of its application. That is the first argument.

My second argument is that, under section 23, there are less rights for the anglophones in Quebec.

Senator Frith: Are you referring to all of section 23?

Senator Flynn: Yes. Senator Tremblay has explained that point. The only advantage in section 23 is the "Canada" clause versus the "Quebec" clause. That is the point, and that has been criticized. Even Mr. Lévesque at times has said that eventually this ought to be corrected.

You then ask me, "Can't you give more?" Well, I don't know about that. It is an interesting question. I will tell you this: If the consequences of the forcible application upon Quebec of section 23 result in the change of some provisions of Bill 101, there will be an incitation. If the legislation has to change to conform to section 23, it will do so, as well, on the basis of what section 23 takes away from the anglophones. If you propose to tell the National Assembly of Quebec to change its law because it must conform to section 23, naturally it will say, "Why not? All right, we will conform to section 23. Since section 23 has the rule of the number, we will use that."

In Quebec, at present, the confessional system is in force. I believe the same system, more or less, is in use in Manitoba as well. These provisions were contained in the B.N.A. Act and cannot be changed. Because it is a confessional system, based on religion, there is protection afforded in a different way. However, the independence of the anglophone Protestant group is ensured in the present legislation. Of course, there is the tradition of fairness. You do not have to doubt for a moment that I would prefer Bill 101 to be amended to provide for the "Canada" clause rather than the "Quebec" clause, but there should be no incitation by means of this Charter to take away the other advantages that you have in Quebec. Those advantages should not be reduced in this way.

Because the spirit of the Accord of November 5 was not to impose this clause on any other provinces, I suggest to you that, by not forcing this clause on the National Assembly of Quebec, you prepare the ground for an improvement. Even if the letter sent by Mr. Lévesque to Mr. Clark was not too convincing, he did admit therein that, perhaps in the coming two years, there should probably be an adjustment made to Bill 101. However, this adjustment will not be achieved by imposing something on Quebec in this manner. You will not have improvements. You will have only the possibility of a reduction to the minimum provided in section 23. I think it is unwise to impose only on Quebec something that Quebec refuses.

In this respect, I believe that the opinion of the official opposition in Quebec is substantially the same as that of the government. Mr. Ryan has said that he would favour the "Canada" clause over the "Quebec" clause, but he certainly will not take away any of the other rights that are provided for the minorities in Quebec.

I repeat, I think it is unwise, under these circumstances, to impose section 23 upon Quebec. I suggest that it is proper, in this instance, to at least give the National Assembly the chance to consider the amendments that are provided herein by making the adoption of this section optional. There is no doubt, I think, that in this way the only pressure that will be put on Quebec will be to ameliorate the situation by providing the "Canada" clause. If, however, you impose this section on Quebec, you might impose, at the same time, conditions that are worse than those already in existence.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe I have lost my chance to speak on the amendment. I hope, however, that someone else will deal with the key word in Senator Flynn's intervention, which is "imposition."

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Frith: I suggest that the implication is that the federal government is imposing this clause upon Quebec.

Senator Flynn: Yes, that is right.

Senator Frith: That, to me, ignores the fact that what we are looking at here is the result of an Accord, not an imposition.

Senator Flynn: Quebec was not in the Accord.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Frith: I agree. The Accord can result in the effectiveness of this clause against the wishes of some in Quebec.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes.

Senator Frith: But that goes for any agreement. Any time you make an agreement you agree to accept it.

Senator Flynn: Would you impose section 133 on Ontario? Would you dare to do that?

Senator Frith: Personally?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Frith: You know I would, personally.

Senator Flynn: Well, personally—your government. Come on!

Senator Frith: In any event, this is not an imposition by the federal government.

Senator Flynn: It certainly is.

Senator Frith: It is an imposition, if you call it that, or it is a provision that flows from an Accord, and the implication—

Senator Flynn: An Accord to which Quebec was not a party.

Senator Frith: —the implication that the federal government is imposing this on Quebec is not consistent with the present resolution's being the product of an Accord of nine provinces plus the federal government.

Senator Flynn: For God's sake!

Senator Roblin: There is a point of correction which surely must be made here, honourable senators. My honourable friend cannot have read the Accord that the provinces issued when they were consolidating their position here just a few days ago. That Accord sets out in detail what they agreed to.

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Roblin: The nine provinces agreed on language, but there were nothing in that Accord by which the nine provinces imposed on the Province of Quebec what they were willing to accept for themselves.

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator Roblin: Not only that, but they made those concessions in respect of language without condition in respect of the Province of Quebec. There was no condition that Quebec had to come in or they would not do it. There was no condition there that they wanted to impose their view in this matter on the Province of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: That is a very important correction of fact that should be made, because otherwise we get a totally erroneous view of the genesis of this particular matter.

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator Roblin: It did not come out of what the provinces agreed to when they made their concord in respect of this matter, and it is wrong to say on that line of reasoning that they are imposing this on Quebec.

Senator Flynn: That is correct.

Senator Frith: The provinces that I referred to agreed to the resolution that is before us.

Senator Flynn: Not Quebec!

Senator Frith: The provinces that signed the Accord agreed to the resolution that we are debating.

Senator Flynn: Are you imposing it on Quebec by this resolution? Do you know what you are talking about?

Senator Frith: What do you mean, am I imposing it? The resolution—

Senator Flynn: Does it impose it on Quebec?

Senator Frith: The answer is that section 23, like all the other sections, applies to Quebec.

Senator Flynn: By what?

Senator Frith: They apply to Quebec because the Constitution is a constitution that is to apply to all provinces. And it applies to Quebec without Quebec's having signed the Accord, and, therefore, that goes for section 23 and it goes for every other section, including the so-called isolation aspect, as if Quebec, because it did not sign the Accord, is suddenly no longer able to participate in the future in constitutional amendments. Of course it is.

Section 23 applies to Quebec. For rhetorical purposes, if I wanted to pick another phrase instead of "applies to", I would say "imposed on."

Senator Flynn: It is imposed.

Senator Frith: Sure it is imposed in that sense. So is every other section imposed on Parliament and every other province.

Senator Flynn: By their agreement.

Senator Frith: That's right. So if you carry your argument—

Senator Roblin: You don't impose something by agreement. We did not impose it on the other provinces. They agreed to it.

Senator Frith: The point is—

Senator Roblin: That is not an imposition.

Senator Frith: The point is that it is simply another way of saying that Quebec should not be bound by the resolution. It is another way of expressing the unanimity rule, which was turned down by the Supreme Court of Canada as neither legally, nor constitutionally, nor traditionally required. It is, in effect, saying, "Look, don't apply section 23 to Quebec, because Quebec did not sign the Accord."

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator Frith: You can make that same argument for every other section. If you open the door to section 23 and say, "By George, that must be right," and you vote for this amendment, then you should vote against the whole Constitution on the basis that you want the rule of unanimity.

Senator Flynn: Utter nonsense! Utter nonsense!

Senator Roblin: I should think you have opened it yourself.

● (1540)

Senator Flynn: Utter nonsense.

Senator Roblin: You voted for it yourself.

Senator Flynn: This has the effect of changing the Constitution with regard to Quebec without its agreement.

Senator Frith: Of course.

Senator Flynn: Then I ask you, are you prepared to accept an amendment which would impose section 133 on Ontario?

Senator Frith: That is another question.

Senator Flynn: Utter nonsense. Try to be logical and stop uttering stupid comments.

Senator Frith: It does not change the fact—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, honourable senators. I give the floor to Senator Godfrey.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise to answer Senator Flynn's question. If at the meeting in 1977, at St. Andrews, Ontario had agreed with Quebec and the other provinces that they would include the equivalent of section 133, and if there was a similar agreement to this one, I would have imposed it on Ontario.

Senator Flynn: Move an amendment.

Senator Frith: Why? Quebec asked for this very thing at St. Andrews.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I have not spoken on this matter yet, although I did ask a question.

Senator Frith: You started it off.

Senator Smith: I have tried to understand the meaning of the answer which the Honourable Senator Frith gave to my question.

Senator Flynn: Unbelievable!

Senator Smith: I find it very difficult to agree with him. What we were talking about was the effect of section 32(1)(b) upon section 23. As I understood the honourable senator, he raised the point that I should not worry about this because section 59 definitely cured the problem which I was raising; namely, that section 23(1) applies. But when I examined section 59 carefully, I saw that it dealt only with section 23(1)(a). I was talking about the rest of section 23.

It seems to me that the answer to the question I asked is that all of section 23, except section 23(1)(a), does apply, not only to the province of Quebec but to every other province and that there are no exceptions, whether it be, for example, Quebec or Nova Scotia, no matter what the law of Quebec or Nova Scotia may be.

Senator Frith: "Everything except 23(1)(a)"?

Senator Smith: Therefore, as section 59 now stands, it has nothing to do with the question I asked. It would have something to do with the question I asked if Senator Tremblay's amendment was accepted, because it includes in section 59 the same type of provision as at present applies to section 23(1)(a). So there is really no doubt in my mind, at least—nor, I hope, in the mind of Senator Frith—that as section 59 now stands it makes the provisions of this resolution the law in Quebec, Nova Scotia and all the other provinces of Canada, no matter what their law may be on the particular point which is covered under the balance of section 23. That must be as clear as can be. There can be no doubt whatever.

Senator Frith: Otherwise, there would be no need for the amendment. That is why the amendment is being proposed.

Senator Smith: Certainly, and that is the point I am making. The answer which the honourable senator gave me, referring me to section 59, really was no answer at all, because none of section 59 dealt with the question I asked.

However, since I now seem to have gone beyond the point of asking a question, I suppose I should exercise my right to speak on this amendment. I shall extend my comments just a little beyond the content of a question and say, now that we have established clearly that section 59 does not apply to anything in section 23, except section 23(1)(a), it follows then that section 23(1)(b) does impose upon every province of Canada, including the province of Quebec, the rest of the provisions of section 23.

As to my learned friend's comment that there is no distinction between what we are talking about here and other sections, I respectfully draw to his attention that that is not so at all. Section 59 specifically states that section 23(1)(a) shall not apply to the province of Quebec except in certain circumstances with the consent of Quebec.

It is equally correct to apply his argument to section 23 as it is to any other section, but when it comes to section 23(1)(a), then that difficulty is recognized and the Province of Quebec is given the right to say that this shall not apply until a certain time.

Senator Frith: Nothing beyond section 23(1)(a) is in issue.

Senator Smith: The honourable senator expanded the scope of the discussion into every part of the document by saying that the same argument would have to be applied to every other section in the Charter.

Senator Frith: The same principle, yes.

Senator Smith: Having expanded it himself, he can hardly now say that we are not talking about the rest of it. I am merely pointing out to him that when he raised the argument that we should not worry about section 23 because it was no more of an imposition on Quebec than all the other sections were, he was wrong. That was recognized in section 23(1)(a) by making it subject to the consent of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: He would use any argument; don't worry about that.

Senator Smith: I have always found that he sticks to an argument which has some colour of right, but I do not know where he can find that to pursue the argument he has just made. It is clear that the right of Quebec to decide when section 23(1)(a) shall apply was preserved. The right of Quebec to say when the other portions of section 23 would apply was not preserved. That is as clear as anything can be. In the one case there was imposition, and in the other case there was no imposition.

Senator Tremblay's amendment would give the same right to Quebec, which is the right to choose whether the rest of section 23 would apply to it, as is already given under section 23(1)(a).

Senator Frith: I think we certainly agree—on that statement anyway.

Senator Smith: It took us a long while to get to that stage, and having reached that stage, then he should recognize the validity of Senator Tremblay's argument.

Senator Frith: That is too big a jump.

Senator Flynn: It is beyond your comprehension; there is no doubt about that.

Senator Frith: Logically, it is too big a jump.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, if the debate on the amendment has ended for the moment, I should like to make some general remarks which will not be applicable to this particular amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, the resolution before us is certainly very different from that which we were discussing some seven months ago. When the matter first came before us, there was no resolution or address before us, although most honourable senators conducted the debate as if there were. There was simply a motion to set up a committee to discuss a paper that was not before Parliament. After some months of work by the joint committee, that committee reported.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator McIlraith, may I have one moment, please?

Senator McIlraith: Certainly, Your Honour.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to the order made by this honourable chamber on December 2, 1981, the recorded vote is deferred. This applies to Senator Tremblay's motion in amendment.

● (1550)

[English]

Senator McIlraith: On February 13 of this year the committee reported. That report contained the resolution which was debated at length, and I took part in that debate. We now have before us a new resolution which, it is true, contains most of the same sections, but which, in point of fact, is very different from the earlier resolution.

I am one of those who regard the Constitution and constitutional change as being a little different from an ordinary statute, in this sense, that in constitutional matters the language of the particular sections, as well as the process, is important; whereas in ordinary statutes or legislation only the language of the sections is important. That is a fundamental difference, but I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of process as well as substance in constitutional amendments.

I took part in the debate on that resolution on March 17, 1981. I assure Senator Riley and others of the Irish persuasion that the choice of date was not significant; it was merely the date on which my turn to speak arose.

Senator Roblin: A good deed on a good day.

Senator McIlraith: On that occasion I spoke strongly against what was then before us. Or, at least, I tried to, and I am not sure whether or not I was successful. I tried to go to considerable lengths to point out that our system of government was and had to be, by the nature of the country, its history and geography, a federal system; and that that federal system, which was expressed through the British North America Act of 1867, gave the provinces sovereign jurisdiction in local and regional matters. They are all set out in the act rather clearly.

In my view, it was wrong for us to seek to override the legislation in those areas of provincial jurisdiction by unilateral action of the two houses of the Parliament of Canada without the concurrence of the provinces.

I rather dislike the practice of quoting oneself, but, in an effort to make it clear, I shall quote from my own remarks as they appear at page 2072 of Senate Hansard. At that time I stated:

However, where I part company with the government is in their attempt to procure basic amendments to the long-established sovereignty of the legislatures of the provinces in the spheres of jurisdiction assigned to them, and to do this without the concurrence of the legislatures of the provinces, and, knowing they cannot do it directly, also seeking to have it done by the United Kingdom.

In that respect, the legislation before us is totally changed. A judgment of the Supreme Court setting out at some length the constitutional practice resulted in a conference or meeting with the provinces. As a result of that conference an accord or agreement—whatever terminology you wish to use—was achieved, consistent with the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. The premiers of all the provinces, with one exception—an exception I very much regret, by the way—concurred in the agreement. The objection I had made earlier was corrected by the meeting with the provinces, and I am very glad of that because I considered the following of the correct constitutional practice in that respect even more important than has been recognized since the Accord was reached.

Regrettably, the Premier of Quebec did not agree with that Accord, and that is his privilege. I could not refrain this afternoon from reflecting on that. We have substantial evidence that a majority of the people of Quebec agree with it, because I note that all the elected representatives in the other place from that province, except three, voted in favour of this resolution. When you bear in mind the enormous majority they get in that province, and speaking as one who has fought in many elections—

Senator Flynn: They were elected under false pretenses.

Senator McIlraith: Well, having fought in many elections, I am always rather amazed at the enormous majority some of them get. My point is that there is some evidence that the majority of people in that province, by the vote of their elected representatives, supported this resolution. To some extent, that relieves my concern with the fact that Premier Lévesque, the leader of the government of that great province, did not concur. I can only express the hope that all those concerned with this subject will continue to work to achieve full accord by whatever means are available. I think I express the views of all parliamentarians on both sides of both houses on that point.

In my speech on March 17, the other ground I strongly opposed in the resolution of the government was that they had not let matters of legality, which had been raised by the provinces, go to the Supreme Court of Canada before proceeding with the proposal for a joint address. I pressed that argument as firmly as I could. Perhaps I can sum it up in one sentence of my speech:

I do not understand the reluctance of the federal government to refer these parts of the resolution to the courts for decision.

I have picked that sentence out of context to make this point.

Later, however, the government did agree to wait for the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. The court delivered a long judgment, but it is now in printed form and is available for everyone to read. I hope it is studied a good deal more as the months and years go by.

We did follow that process of having the courts determine the outstanding legal questions which arose out of the earlier resolution. That judgment resulted in my earlier objection being totally removed, and I am very content with that result.

Those two objections having been removed, there is much one could say about individual sections, but that is not my purpose in speaking today. I could argue about the drafting of various sections to try to attain perfection in them. I view these matters as being exercises in doing the best you can under the circumstances at a given time relative to the proposed legislation. While this is a somewhat pragmatic approach, looking at what has been achieved in the present resolution—thanks to the courts, the provincial premiers and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister—I believe it is a good result. On balance, I am not about to condemn the resolution because of any particular section I might wish to have drafted differently. There is one section whose true significance I believe has been overlooked, except by Senator Roblin and a few other honourable senators. It is what has been referred to as the “notwithstanding” section. Because of its importance, it might be useful if I read it into the record. It is section 33, which reads as follows:

● (1600)

33.(1) Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature, as the case may be, that the Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter.

Then there is the following very important subsection:

(2) An Act or a provision of an Act in respect of which a declaration made under this section is in effect shall have such operation as it would have but for the provision of this Charter referred to in the declaration.

That is clear enough. It continues:

(3) A declaration made under subsection (1) shall cease to have effect five years after it comes into force or on such earlier date as may be specified in the declaration.

There are then two further subsections which perhaps are not relevant.

My point is that the provisions of the Charter are very wide and are in general language. By the very nature of things it is necessary for parliaments to enact legislation that is often of a regulatory nature of one sort or another, and that applies even more so to provincial legislatures. They have all kinds of regulatory provisions with respect to licensing motor vehicle operators, certain practices dealing with juveniles, and so on.

Senator Flynn: It could not be worse at the provincial level. We have here 15 volumes of ordinary regulations.

Senator McIlraith: If honourable senators look at the absolute nature of the provisions of some of the sections of the Charter—bearing in mind that the provinces were not involved in the detailed drafting of the Charter—they will see that something could arise in the future which might require, with the concurrence of everyone concerned, a different treatment, but which might be in violation of those clauses as they stand, without any method of relief from them. I can think of some, on the basis of age and sex, for instance.

In any event, this provides a measure of safety from the absolute nature of those provisions. Since the Accord was reached, I have heard some regret expressed that the “notwithstanding” section was included. There has been some suggestion that it lessens the benefit or the protection provided by the Charter of Rights. I cannot see it that way. I think it improves the protective quality of the Charter of Rights, and I shall explain why. When those cases arise,

A declaration made under subsection (1) shall cease to have effect five years after it comes into force—

I would also point out that there has to be a general election, by virtue of other provisions, in less than five years in all legislatures, whether federal or provincial; which means that that piece of legislation has to be an issue in that election campaign if the public has any awareness of what is happening. There is the opportunity for all the people in a particular jurisdiction affected to pass on that exception and whether or not it was really justified.

[Senator McIlraith.]

That, in my opinion, is an effective check, because through the years I have come to respect and believe in the sovereignty of the people as expressed in a fairly conducted general election. I have found that to be really the best protection of the freedoms and rights that we have. It is true that except for that provision we rely on the courts; we have transferred to the courts the ultimate responsibility for deciding on whether or not the Charter is being properly followed. I believe the provisions of section 33 are an even better protection of our rights than a reference to the courts. This is very ingenious. Whoever drafted it did a rather excellent job, I think, and I commend him for it, because it returns the decision, as to whether the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is being adequately followed, to the people themselves, for their own decision. I know no better authority than that. I like the provision, and as far as I am concerned it greatly enhances the resolution.

I do not like section 47 because I think it should have been dealt with under the subject matter of the reform of Parliament. I happen to be one who wishes to get into the subject of parliamentary reform, and I would like very much to deal with that subject. When I speak of reform of Parliament, of course, I do not mean the reform of one house of Parliament only.

In any event, that section takes away a certain protection from the provinces. I suspect the provinces did not fully realize its significance when they agreed to it. If this place has any validity, it is for two reasons. One is that it is, and was originally intended to be, a place where regional rights find protection. That, to me, seems necessary by reason of the very large and sprawling nature of our country, geographically speaking. The other reason is one that has only come to the fore in the last few years. The Senate is one of the few remaining checks on the use of power by the government. It seems to me that a lot of the other checks on the use of power have been eroded in the last few years. That, of course, is a slightly different subject, which I would love to discuss later; but the Senate has come to be, as I sometimes call it in my remarks, the last remaining check on the improper use of power by governments. I therefore deplore this section.

I can provide no better example of what I am referring to than the very resolution that was before us earlier, and in this connection I have already quoted from my own speech. But what was the date of that speech? March 17. What is the date today? December 4. How many days have elapsed between those two dates? I leave you to do your own arithmetic. Would the right of the provinces to be heard on this basic matter of constitutional reform have been upheld had this place not raised the question of the impropriety of proceeding without consultation with the provinces? I ask you that question. I do not purport to give the answer. You honourable ladies and gentlemen are competent to do your own arithmetic and to answer the question in your own way.

In any event, the section is there, and I hope that the provinces, when they come to think about it, will be sufficiently alert to think the section through when they come to deal with questions of constitutional reform in the future.

The section is rather imperfect. It reads as follows:

47. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

● (1610)

Honourable senators, I should like to deal with section 47(2), which I will read in its entirety.

(2) Any period when Parliament is prorogued or dissolved shall not be counted in computing the one hundred and eighty day period referred to in subsection (1).

Honourable senators, how often has there been a long adjournment of the house, other than by prorogation or dissolution? Indeed, the practice of adjournment rather than prorogation, has always been used during parliamentary sessions in the last few years. If you take, therefore, an adjournment of four or five months, which is not uncommonly long, you will see where your 180 days go. The period of adjournment counts in the 180 days.

Though I mention small points with regard to this particular section, to me they are basic. Perhaps they represent an area where the first ministers of the provinces slipped a little in examining them. However, they can, and, I am sure, will be corrected when the question of parliamentary reform is being dealt with. I am not too worried about this because I can see the provincial premiers beginning to realize what it implies, at some point when they actually deal with the section.

Honourable senators, I could deal with other sections in more detail, but that is not my purpose. I felt that those two sections should be specifically drawn to the attention of honourable senators. Considering the entire constitutional package and notwithstanding what I have said about the section concerning the Parliament of Canada—which, in my view, is improperly dragged into the subject before us at this time—I must come to the conclusion that the process to which I objected last March has been corrected. I believe that the process in achieving the resolution before us is the correct one. On balance, the resolution is such that I would not wish to oppose it. I rather feel that it is now, by process and content, one which I can support. Accordingly, I shall vote for the resolution.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 7, at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, it had been my intention to ask leave to move that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. rather than the normal time but, in view of the absence of both the Leader of the Opposition and his deputy leader, I will ask leave later this day to revert to Notices of Motions in order to make that proposition. There is a long list of speakers and we consider it important that everyone who wishes to speak have an opportunity to do so within the time limits we have established.

Hon. David Walker: Your Honour, it would be a fine thing if we could shorten Question Period in order to proceed with the debate on the resolution.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is up to honourable senators to do that.

Senator Walker: Touché!

Senator Molgat: I can assure the honourable senator that there will be no objection from this side.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

INVESTMENT PROJECTIONS—EFFECT ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister responsible for economic development. It relates once again to the unemployment record, and particularly, and perhaps more importantly, to investment intentions and how they affect the unemployed. The Canadian Manufacturers Association survey of investments indicates that the real growth in investment is likely to be only a little over 6 per cent in 1981 as opposed to the recent projection of 10 per cent by Statistics Canada. Will the minister tell us whether that 10 per cent objective is unrealistic, or whether the projection of 6.2 per cent by the Canadian Manufacturers Association is out of whack?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, what Senator Doody is asking me for is not information, but an opinion as to whether one set of opinions that has been put forward is more valid than another set. I think much depends on the assumptions on which such opinions are based. We are well aware of the fact that the relatively high interest rates that we were experiencing up until a few weeks ago did have a dampening effect on investment intentions, but I suppose it is equally true to say that the present significantly lower interest rates may, in fact, enhance investment projections.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I must rephrase the question. I certainly did not ask the minister for his own personal opinion. I simply stated that the Canadian Manufacturers Association survey indicates that a 6.2 per cent growth rate in investment is likely for 1981, as compared to the recent projection of 10 per cent by Statistics Canada. I am wondering which of these two is accurate. Surely the professional people who advise the minister have told him that either 6.2 per cent or 10 per cent is a reasonable projection.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, whether my honourable friend likes it or not, that is asking for an opinion, but I will check his question out and see what assumptions have gone into both sides.

The other part of the honourable senator's question that is a little confusing is his reference to projections for 1981. Those would not be projections any more. They would almost be past history. Perhaps he would like to revise the question and state those factors that he would like me to look into.

● (1410)

Senator Doody: That is fine as it is, even with a month left.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): There are no delayed answers today, honourable senators, I am pleased to announce.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from Friday, December 4, 1981, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault:

THAT, WHEREAS in the past certain amendments to the Constitution of Canada have been made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom at the request and with the consent of Canada;

AND WHEREAS it is in accord with the status of Canada as an independent state that Canadians be able to amend their Constitution in Canada in all respects;

AND WHEREAS it is also desirable to 10 provide in the Constitution of Canada for the recognition of certain fundamental rights and freedoms and to make other amendments to that Constitution;

A respectful address be presented to Her 15 Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, 20 respectfully approach Your Majesty, requesting that you may graciously be pleased to cause to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom a measure containing the recitals and clauses hereinafter set forth: 25

CONSIDÉRANT :

que le Parlement du Royaume-Uni a modifié à plusieurs reprises la Constitution du Canada à la demande et avec le consentement de celui-ci;

que, de par le statut d'État indépendant du Canada, il est légitime que les Canadiens aient tout pouvoir pour modifier leur Constitution au Canada;

qu'il est souhaitable d'inscrire dans la 10 Constitution du Canada la reconnaissance de certains droits et libertés fondamentaux et d'y apporter d'autres modifications, il est proposé que soit présentée respectueusement à Sa Majesté la Reine l'adresse dont 15 la teneur suit :

A Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine,
Très Gracieuse Souveraine :

Nous, membres du Sénat du Canada réunis en Parlement, fidèles sujets de Votre Majesté, 20 demandons respectueusement à Votre Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi ainsi conçu :

ANNEXE A—SCHEDULE A

An Act to give effect to a request by the Senate and House of Commons of Canada

Loi donnant suite à une demande du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes du Canada

Whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to give effect to the provisions hereinafter set forth and the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty requesting that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a Bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose.

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. The Constitution Act, 1981 set out in Schedule B to this Act is hereby enacted for and shall have the force of law in Canada and shall come into force as provided in that Act.

2. No Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the Constitution Act, 1981 comes into force shall extend to Canada as part of its law.

3. So far as it is not contained in Schedule B, the French version of this Act is set out in Schedule A to this Act and has the same authority in Canada as the English version thereof.

4. This Act may be cited as the Canada Act.

Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine, considérant :
5 qu'à la demande et avec le consentement du Canada, le Parlement du Royaume-Uni est invité à adopter une loi visant à donner effet aux dispositions énoncées ci-après et que le Sénat et la Chambre des communes 10 du Canada réunis en Parlement ont présenté une adresse demandant à Sa Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi à cette fin, 15
sur l'avis et du consentement des Lords spirituels et temporels et des Communes réunis en Parlement, et par l'autorité de celui-ci, édicte :

1. La Loi constitutionnelle de 1981, énoncée à l'annexe B, est édictée pour le Canada et y a force de loi. Elle entre en vigueur conformément à ses dispositions.

2. Les lois adoptées par le Parlement du Royaume-Uni après l'entrée en vigueur de la 25 Loi constitutionnelle de 1981 ne font pas partie du droit du Canada.

3. La partie de la version française de la présente loi qui figure à l'annexe A a force de loi au Canada au même titre que la 30 version anglaise correspondante.

4. Titre abrégé de la présente loi : Loi sur le Canada.

PART I

CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law:

Guarantee of Rights and Freedoms

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

Fundamental Freedoms

2. Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:

- (a) freedom of conscience and religion;
- (b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;

Democratic Rights

3. Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein.

4. (1) No House of Commons and no legislative assembly shall continue for longer than five years from the date fixed for the return of the writs at a general election of its members.

(2) In time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection, a House of Commons may be continued by Parliament and a legislative assembly may be continued by the legislature beyond five years if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of the House

ANNEXE B

LOI CONSTITUTIONNELLE DE 1981

PARTIE I

CHARTRE CANADIENNE DES DROITS ET LIBERTÉS

Attendu que le Canada est fondé sur des principes qui reconnaissent la suprématie de Dieu et la primauté du droit :

Garantie des droits et libertés

1. La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés garantit les droits et libertés qui y sont énoncés. Ils ne peuvent être restreints que par une règle de droit, dans des limites qui soient raisonnables et dont la justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique.

Libertés fondamentales

2. Chacun a les libertés fondamentales suivantes :

- a) liberté de conscience et de religion;
- b) liberté de pensée, de croyance, d'opinion et d'expression, y compris la liberté de la presse et des autres moyens de communication;
- c) liberté de réunion pacifique;
- d) liberté d'association.

Droits démocratiques

3. Tout citoyen canadien a le droit de vote et est éligible aux élections législatives fédérales ou provinciales.

4. (1) Le mandat maximal de la Chambre des communes et des assemblées législatives est de cinq ans à compter de la date fixée pour le retour des brefs relatifs aux élections générales correspondantes.

(2) Le mandat de la Chambre des communes ou celui d'une assemblée législative peut être prolongé respectivement par le Parlement ou par la législature en question au-delà de cinq ans en cas de guerre, d'invasion ou d'insurrection, réelles ou appréhendées, pourvu que cette prolongation ne fasse pas

PART V

PROCEDURE FOR AMENDING CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

General procedure for amending
Constitution of Canada

38. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by

- (a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and
- (b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces

PROCÉDURE DE MODIFICATION DE LA CONSTITUTION DU CANADA

38. (1) La Constitution du Canada peut être modifiée par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada, autorisée à la fois :

- a) par des résolutions du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes;
- b) par des résolutions des assemblées législatives d'au moins deux tiers des provinces dont la population confondue représente, selon le recensement général le plus récent à l'époque, au moins cinquante pour cent de la population de toutes les provinces.

Majority of members

(2) An amendment made under subsection (1) that derogates from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province shall require a resolution supported by a majority of the members of each of the Senate, the House of Commons and the legislative assemblies required under subsection (1).

5 (2) Une modification faite conformément au paragraphe (1) mais dérogatoire à la compétence législative, aux droits de propriété ou à tous autres droits ou privilèges d'une législature ou d'un gouvernement provincial exige une résolution adoptée à la 10 majorité des sénateurs, des députés fédéraux et des députés de chacune des assemblées législatives du nombre requis de provinces.

5 Majorité simple

Expression of dissent

(3) An amendment referred to in subsection (2) shall not have effect in a province the legislative assembly of which has expressed its dissent thereto by resolution supported by a majority of its members prior to the issue of the proclamation to which the amendment relates unless that legislative assembly, subsequently, by resolution supported by a majority of its members, revokes its dissent and authorizes the amendment.

(3) La modification visée au paragraphe 15 (2) est sans effet dans une province dont l'assemblée législative a, avant la prise de la proclamation, exprimé son désaccord par une résolution adoptée à la majorité des députés, 20 sauf si cette assemblée, par résolution également adoptée à la majorité, revient sur son désaccord et autorise la modification.

Désaccord

Revocation of dissent

(4) A resolution of dissent made for the purposes of subsection (3) may be revoked at any time before or after the issue of the proclamation to which it relates.

(4) La résolution de désaccord visée au 25 paragraphe (3) peut être révoquée à tout moment, indépendamment de la date de la proclamation à laquelle elle se rapporte. 25

Levée du désaccord

Restriction on proclamation

39. (1) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) before the expiration of one year from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder, unless the legislative assembly of each province has previously adopted a resolution of assent or dissent.

39. (1) La proclamation visée au paragraphe 38(1) ne peut être prise dans l'année 30 suivant l'adoption de la résolution à l'origine de la procédure de modification que si l'assemblée législative de chaque province a préalablement adopté une résolution d'agrément ou de désaccord. 30

Restriction

Idem

(2) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) after the expiration of three years from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder.

(2) La proclamation visée au paragraphe 38(1) ne peut être prise que dans les trois ans 35 suivant l'adoption de la résolution à l'origine de la procédure de modification. 35

Idem

Compensation

40. Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers provincial legislative powers relating to education or other cultural matters from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

40. Le Canada fournit une juste compensation 40 aux provinces auxquelles ne s'applique pas une modification faite conformément au paragraphe 38(1) et relative, en matière d'éducation ou dans d'autres domaines culturels, à un transfert de compétences législatives provinciales au Parlement.

- (a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;
- (b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province is entitled to be represented at the time this Part comes into force;
- (c) subject to section 43, the use of the English or the French language;
- (d) the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada; and
- (e) an amendment to this Part.

Amendment by general
procedure

42. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with subsection 38(1):

- (a) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada;
- (b) the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators;
- (c) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of Senators;
- (d) subject to paragraph 41(d), the Supreme Court of Canada;
- (e) the extension of existing provinces into the territories; and
- (f) notwithstanding any other law or practice, the establishment of new provinces.

Exception

(2) Subsections 38(2) to (4) do not apply in respect of amendments in relation to matters referred to in subsection (1).

Amendment of provisions relating to some but not all provinces

- b) le droit d'une province d'avoir à la Chambre des communes un nombre de députés au moins égal à celui des sénateurs par lesquels elle est habilitée à être représentée lors de l'entrée en vigueur de la présente partie;
- c) sous réserve de l'article 43, l'usage du français ou de l'anglais;
- d) la composition de la Cour suprême du Canada;
- e) la modification de la présente partie.

42. (1) Toute modification de la Constitution du Canada portant sur les questions suivantes se fait conformément au paragraphe 38(1) :

- a) le principe de la représentation proportionnelle des provinces à la Chambre des communes prévu par la Constitution du Canada;
- b) les pouvoirs du Sénat et le mode de sélection des sénateurs;
- c) le nombre des sénateurs par lesquels une province est habilitée à être représentée et les conditions de résidence qu'ils doivent remplir;
- d) sous réserve de l'alinéa 41d), la Cour suprême du Canada;
- e) le rattachement aux provinces existantes de tout ou partie des territoires;
- f) par dérogation à toute autre loi ou usage, la création de provinces.

Procédure normale de modification

(2) Les paragraphes 38(2) à (4) ne s'appliquent pas aux questions mentionnées au paragraphe (1).

Exception

45. Subject to section 41, the legislature of each province may exclusively make laws amending the constitution of the province.

45. Sous réserve de l'article 41, une législature a compétence exclusive pour modifier la constitution de sa province.

Initiation of amendment procedures

46. (1) The procedures for amendment under sections 38, 41, 42 and 43 may be initiated either by the Senate or the House of Commons or by the legislative assembly of a province.

46. (1) L'initiative des procédures de modification visées aux articles 38, 41, 42 et 43 appartient au Sénat, à la Chambre des communes ou à une assemblée législative.

Revocation of authorization

(2) A resolution of assent made for the purposes of this Part may be revoked at any time before the issue of a proclamation authorized by it.

(2) Une résolution d'agrément adoptée dans le cadre de la présente partie peut être révoquée à tout moment avant la date de la proclamation qu'elle autorise.

Amendments
without Senate
resolution

47. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

47. (1) Dans les cas visés à l'article 38, 41, 42 ou 43, il peut être passé outre au défaut d'autorisation du Sénat si celui-ci n'a pas adopté de résolution dans un délai de cent quatre-vingts jours suivant l'adoption de celle de la Chambre des communes et si cette dernière, après l'expiration du délai, adopte une nouvelle résolution dans le même sens.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

Amendment to *Constitution
Act, 1867*

50. The Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly named the British North America Act, 1867) is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 92 thereof, the following heading and section:

"Non-Renewable Natural Resources, Forestry Resources and Electrical Energy

Laws respecting non-renewable natural resources, forestry resources and electrical energy

92A. (1) In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to

(a) exploration for non-renewable natural resources in the province;
(b) development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom; and

(c) development, conservation and management of sites and facilities in the province for the generation and production of electrical energy.

Export from
resources

(2) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the export from the province to another part of Canada of the primary production from non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the production from facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy, but such laws may not authorize or provide for discrimination in prices or in supplies exported to another part of Canada.

PARTIE VI

MODIFICATION DE LA LOI CONSTITUTIONNELLE DE 1867

50. La Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 (antérieurement désignée sous le titre : Acte de l'Amérique du Nord britannique, 1867) est modifiée par insertion, après l'article 92, de la rubrique et de l'article suivants :

Compétence
provinciale

a) prospection des ressources naturelles non renouvelables de la province;
b) exploitation, conservation et gestion des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, y compris leur rythme de production primaire;
c) aménagement, conservation et gestion des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique.

(2) La législature de chaque province a compétence pour légiférer en ce qui concerne l'exportation, hors de la province, à destination d'une autre partie du Canada, de la production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, ainsi que de la production d'énergie électrique de la province, sous réserve de ne pas adopter de lois autorisant ou prévoyant des disparités de prix ou des disparités dans les exportations destinées à une autre partie du Canada.

(a) production from a non-renewable natural resource is primary production therefrom if

(i) it is in the form in which it exists upon its recovery or severance from its natural state, or 5

(ii) it is a product resulting from processing or refining the resource, and is not a manufactured product or a product resulting from refining crude oil, 10 refining upgraded heavy crude oil, refining gases or liquids derived from coal or refining a synthetic equivalent of crude oil; and

(b) production from a forestry resource is 15 primary production therefrom if it consists of sawlogs, poles, lumber, wood chips, sawdust or any other primary wood product, or wood pulp, and is not a product manufactured from wood." 20

a) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource naturelle non renouvelable :

(i) soit le produit qui se présente sous la même forme que lors de son extraction 5 du milieu naturel,

(ii) soit le produit non manufacturé de la transformation, du raffinage ou de l'affinage d'une ressource, à l'exception du produit du raffinage du pétrole brut, 10 du raffinage du pétrole brut lourd amélioré, du raffinage des gaz ou des liquides dérivés du charbon ou du raffinage d'un équivalent synthétique du pétrole brut; 15

b) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource forestière la production constituée de billots, de poteaux, de bois d'œuvre, de copeaux, de sciure ou d'autre produit primaire du bois, ou de pâte de 20 bois, à l'exception d'un produit manufacturé en bois.»

PART VII

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, things are moving so rapidly this afternoon that I scarcely have my platform of old Hansards ready, let alone my thoughts collected. Nevertheless, I am happy to participate in this debate. I am always happy to speak in this chamber and, what is rare for a politician, I am happy to listen. I enjoy the debates here because the speeches are, almost invariably, whole and complete of themselves. They may be totally in error, in my lights, but they are well presented, well structured and well executed. It is as much an honour to participate with those who have gone before me as it will be with those who follow me.

As my colleagues have pointed out, honourable senators, there have been many changes since we last debated this important matter. The courts have been heard from. The provinces are now part of the operation and the unilateralism which distressed so many people is gone. An amending formula has been agreed upon. All of these things are essential and we are glad that they came about, because the confrontations were becoming most hurtful to Canada. The divisions were getting deeper and the resentments more intense. The breakthrough was welcome. I think we could all detect that feeling among our citizenry.

There was relief that the Accord was achieved, along with some dazzlement, if I may use that word, about the precise manner in which it was achieved. Not having a Sanhedrin or a Supreme Soviet here, we are not accustomed to midnight meetings, but apparently the Accord was reached at midnight. It was a welcome meeting of minds. It is said that we are not a dramatic people, but the element of drama was indeed present on this occasion.

As is usual with dramatic events, it was uncertain the next day as to what was agreed upon. We were not clear on the terms of the Accord. We do not know what form this vital agreement took, whether it was written on a cigarette box or on bits and pieces of paper. In other words, in a short time it became apparent that, while the nation rejoiced at the Accord, there were many significant omissions. Whether the women of Canada or the Indian people were the first to note what had not happened, it is difficult to say. It was not long, however, before these two groups—one a majority and one a minority—were heard from. Honourable senators, it is a good thing they were heard from because the omission of the rights of these two groups was indeed a monstrous one.

Since it has become apparent that vital points had either been forgotten, discarded or dropped, none of which is wholesome in constitution-making, I suggest that it would not be the wisest thing to take this hastily conceived document and say that now the real course of citizenship is to move it as fast as is humanly possible. When one hears of errors and omissions in such a document, it seems to me that it is not the best course of action to roll on into high speed just as quickly as we can. I am not the only one interpreting the move as being one of high speed. Shortly after the Accord was announced, I read an item from the Canadian Press, as follows:

After urging MPs to do their duty by putting "gentle pressure" on the provinces, Chrétien proceeded to apply some gentle pressure himself by promising the federal government would recognize aboriginal rights in areas of federal jurisdiction if native leaders agreed to the proposal by next Tuesday.

● (1415)

Why by next Tuesday? Why the hurry? Those people were here long before Confederation and long before us. They have found egregious errors and fearful omissions. Why would it have to be next Tuesday? Why even next Thursday?

An Hon. Senator: They've got a veto.

Senator Murray: Who said that?

Senator Macquarrie: Sometimes I have thought in those hours that some of the legislating and negotiating had about all the presence of an operation to sell last year's potatoes. There must be a little more to constitution-making than crass dealing. I hope there is.

In another Canadian Press dispatch a few days later we read that "Privy Council President Yvon Pinard told reporters he hopes debate in the Commons and Senate can be finished by the end of the week,"—that's last week—"with the new constitution winging its way to Britain next week and home by Christmas."

We may be shattering the railways, but we are in the jet age in this. The jet age is fine. I am all for expedition, if it is not apparent that an opposite course is better. Many things have been brought forward that would seem to me to advise that we think and not hasten.

A young man of whom I had never heard before and whose newspaper I must confess I did not know, Mitchell Beer of the News/North from Yellowknife said some days ago on a CBC program:

How typically Canadian, a cynic might say, for a Charter of Rights and Freedoms to become so fraught with mechanics that it loses the principles. Or for inalienable rights in a democratic society to become subordinate to political whim. The process that was supposed to include all Canadians degenerated over the months into political horse-trading so convoluted and morally bankrupt that most of us threw up our hands in dismay. The ideals were left 'way behind, in the first leg of a year-long bureaucratic maze.

Sad!

As we take part in this debate we all want to be fair and reasonable and objective, but it is hard to forget some of the things that were said in its earlier phases. How often the nation was told that nothing could be worse than a checker-board Canada; how often we were told that nothing could be more heinous than bargaining resources for rights. But isn't the document changed? Aren't some of the principles surely altered? We cannot forget that; we listened so carefully at an earlier time.

Senator Everett, in his excellent speech the other day, said that many things have been improved, but that new problems have been created. So we are back with the challenge to be thoughtful, and to be as sure as we can be, that what we are doing is a matter of public good and not the opposite. I think essentially on this we have to ask ourselves whether the adoption of this Address by this house and its forwarding will help our country and its people, or will do the opposite. There are highly respectable opinions in the land supporting each side of that question.

The Prime Minister himself told the press that as he looked upon the new document he was filled with remorse. Some of his followers are jubilant, exuberant. I have read more than once that this is "the finest charter of liberties in the whole world." Now, it is good to feel that your team is the best; it is good to feel that you have the best school;—I was going to say "the best wife," but I will take that one out—it is good to feel that you have the best neighbourhood. It is good to feel that everything of ours is the best, but that is not the same thing as wisdom. To say that "ours is the best," especially if you have not looked at some of the others, is perhaps more euphoric than sound.

When compared to those of other countries, this Charter is not the most generous or the most satisfactory. Certainly, it is not the most literate, whether it is compared to the American Constitution or the charters of France, West Germany and many other countries. Will the clauses in this document before us be recited by Canadian children for generations to come? Does anybody really believe that many will commit this document to memory? Will we and, more particularly, those who follow us in future generations, find in this the inspiration that Americans have found for many years in some of the gems that they have in the Declaration of Independence or, more appropriately, the American Constitution itself?

I have heard it said in this debate that we should not try to be perfectionists; that if we keep striving for perfection, we will do nothing at all and that perfectionists never accomplish anything. I would be the last person to even come close to receiving the label of "perfect"—far from it. Nor can I recall meeting anyone on Parliament Hill or off it who struck me as even being close to perfect. They used to say that the Roman Catholics go to mass every week at least, that the Anglicans say every Sunday that they left undone the things they should have done and did the things they shouldn't have done, and that the Presbyterians say that they are filled with the blackest of iniquities and that they are vile creatures before the Lord.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Some of them.

Senator Macquarrie: The honourable senator says "some of them"—I make no exceptions, nor does God. Though we all live in an imperfect world, there is nothing to stop us from asking for something better. Surely progress and great nations are made upon the constant striving for something better.

This document is verbose, dull, heavy and it is sometimes unclear in its construction. Senator Walker, who is a brilliant lawyer, pointed out the other night some outrageous contradictions between one clause and others. We were never told to expect beautiful English from lawyers but, rather, to expect legal English. And in the case of a lawyer who is also a bureaucrat, apparently the product is worse. Clearly, this document is an example of the detrimental results of too much haste. A little time and a little more effort would have produced a document with greater clarity, greater lucidity and, perhaps, if I may use the expression, greater class.

I said long ago, and I say now, though it is too late—and probably it was too late long ago—that a matter so important as a constitution should have the leisure in time and the careful consideration that a constitutional convention would give it. At that convention, along with the politicians, the statesmen and the learned jurists, there might be a few people who were expert at English, and who would be at hand as advisers or, perhaps, as members. When I was at Mount Allison University the other day, I suggested as one such adviser or member, Margaret Laurence, an old university classmate and friend. The students began to laugh. Whether or not it was because they had read too many of her four-letter words, I do not know, but I think that someone of that calibre might have helped us a bit with the "whereases," the "wherefores" and the "notwithstandings."

I was honoured to be in the town of Borden, Prince Edward Island, on November 11. After the ceremonies, I was involved in a little discussion in the secretary's office. One of the people present, who was a world war veteran, began to talk about the Bill of Rights and asked those present whether any of them knew it. None of us answered in the affirmative. Then he began to say that he knew it, and he quoted those immortal words that are in the lower right-hand corner of the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights:

I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind.

Like others here in this chamber, I heard the former Prime Minister utter those words. They are evocative and inspiring, and we might have had something like them in the document before us.

● (1425)

I should like now to say a few words about the amendment moved by Senator Walker to which I had the honour of being seconder. We listened to Senator Walker's cogent arguments and to his concise presentation. We all know that a suspensive veto would be sufficient for an upper chamber. I have always felt that section 47 had an element of the back door about it, and I do not think that is good enough for this historic chamber. It also puzzled me that so much was dropped from the former document as it went through the process prior to the midnight conclave but, in this instance, something was inserted. Interesting!

Senate reform is an old story. It first hit the pages of the newspapers during the first political convention in 1893. Then McGregor Dawson described Mackenzie King's theory of reform—the substitution of live Grits for dead Tories. However, now there is a modern argument.

When provincial politicians talk about reforming the Senate, they think the recipe for doing so, which would result in the end of all the troubles, the total panacea, would be to have a different assembly, the members of which would be appointed by the provinces. They seem to feel that appointments made by the provinces would lead to perfection, whereas the present imperfections result from federal government appointees who have not been performing well. It pays to look at some of these arguments at least twice.

Although I know that the country can live without the Senate and the Senate could live without my presence, I was a little surprised to know that, at a time when legislation is vaster and more complex than ever before, a federal government would say it would be in its interests not to have a second chamber in a bicameral parliament. I think this would be the worst of times to destroy our historic bicameralism. Therefore, I support and commend the amendment.

Honourable senators, we have before us an unusually large number of amendments. It is almost as strenuous as on Friday, when we were being showered by goodies as each minister got up and announced what benefices were falling upon us. To add to this, I will move yet another amendment to which I will speak very briefly. However, that is not to say that my proposal does not merit very careful and full attention. I believe the arguments in favour are very cogent and very strong.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Macquarrie: I believe that those who take the position that the Senate of Canada has a special role in preserving, explaining and elucidating the rights of minorities are describing a very fine purpose of this illustrious body. I am firmly convinced that the legislatures of the two territories and the people they represent have not been well treated in this process. They are being put in a position whereby their political freedom is being diminished more than that of the people of any existing province. Therefore, I should like to move, seconded by Senator Nurgitz:

[Senator Macquarrie.]

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981, be amended by striking out paragraphs (e) and (f) of subsection 42(1).

What is at the root of this amendment? Why am I proffering it and why am I supporting it? A long history of propriety and common sense has established a formula—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, may I read your motion?

Senator Macquarrie: Yes, certainly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by Honourable Senator Nurgitz:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981, be amended by striking out paragraphs (e) and (f) of subsection 42(1).

Pursuant to the order adopted on December 2, a recorded division will be deferred.

Senator Macquarrie: My apologies, Your Honour. Overwhelmed by having such an important role as to actually move an amendment, I am afraid it went to my head and I did not sit down when I should have.

● (1430)

The way paragraphs 42(1)(e) and (f) stand, it is clear that the people of the Northwest Territories, before they ever become a province, will not only have to express their views—

Senator Lucier: And the Yukon.

Senator Macquarrie: Of course, the Yukon Territory as well. Excuse me. The territories will not only have to get their own peoples government's support, and now, for the first time, support from other provinces. They will play a role in this.

That is something quite different. When the various provinces entered Confederation, they conducted negotiations with the Government of Canada, and after suitable agreements, became a part of the Dominion. For the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory it will be different.

How do they react to this? Are some of them upset? Honourable senators, all of the 22 members of the Northwest Territories legislature came to Ottawa, stayed for some days, talked to people and put their case to them. They very strongly revealed an injustice. The legislatures of both territories sent a unanimous resolution asking simply that paragraphs (e) and (f) be dropped. Is it too much to make that small change in this document? I say that it is not too much. Why should we impose upon the people of the two territories restrictions, inhibitions and curtailments that the people of our own provinces did not have imposed on them?

The Province of Prince Edward Island did not have to consult with other provinces, and they did not give them a veto over provincehood. Neither did any of the other provinces. Why lay it on the people of the north? Do you wonder that they feel alienated; do you wonder that they feel poorly done by? Are you surprised, honourable senators, that every one of them should ask us to remedy that wrong?

I just do not know how that got in there. I was not at the meetings in the afternoon or the evening, but the Globe and Mail has some suspicions. I do not often read editorials into the record, and the Globe and Mail is not my most beloved newspaper, but it had a cogent editorial entitled: "Selling of the North", on November 21, 1981. That editorial reads as follows:

The people of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon—both natives and whites—have been used as bargaining counters in the constitutional argument between the Prime Minister and the premiers. In one very important area they did not even know what was happening until the bargain had been struck.

Last week the 22 members of the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories . . . decided they must go to Ottawa and ask Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau to give them the help he had promised . . . He met them for 20 minutes.

The editorial goes on to state:

The constitutional resolution now before Parliament, and agreed to by nine of the premiers . . . includes two new clauses—

Which we now have before us. This is the kind of thing the Globe and Mail has said. It is a bit harsh. The editorial continues:

This was obviously a federal sop to the provinces, several of which have shown a desire to expand into the territories.

I do not go in for that putative imperialism or raging provincialism. I think it is up to the people of the Northwest Territories to decide if they want to join some of the provinces to the south of them. Certainly, if the Yukon Territory wishes to join British Columbia, let the Yukon Territory decide that, but do not put those people in a position whereby the provinces who might covet their territory, to use a good biblical term, will be the ones which will forestall them in their operations and movements towards provincehood.

With respect to the Honourable Senator Lucier, who said the other evening that he was not in favour of provincehood now, perhaps that is not the course; perhaps the question is one of time, but I say the question is one of right.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I have just been accused of being against provincial status. If Senator Macquarrie will read my speech, he will see that I am not, and never have been, opposed to provincial status. I stated that clearly. I said that provincial status for both the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories is not "if;" it is "when." I am sure it was a slip of the tongue, and I would not like to have the record show that I am opposed to provincial status for the Yukon.

● (1435)

Senator Macquarrie: I certainly am sorry. Perhaps my language was somewhat convoluted. I did say, or considered, that it was a question of time. I presumed that I heard the honourable senator's speech, listened to every word of it and remembered it fully. Certainly I would not suggest that he is an anti-provincehood man, but there are some who want it now, some who want it later, and some who say let it take its course. I do not enter into that. I am not a man of the territories. I am concerned about their right to proceed towards provincehood in the same way that the residents of my province and all the other provinces did. That is what I am interested in here. I will not get involved in the politics of the Northwest Territories. I have enough trouble with that in other areas.

The Globe and Mail editorial concludes:

Canada has treated the people of the territories as less than citizens, has given them no role in constitutional debates, very little autonomy, and allowed them to be run by politicians and bureaucrats thousands of miles away, many of whom have never even seen the North.

Section 41(1)(e) and (f) should be stricken from the resolution.

So says the Globe and Mail, and so say I.

I commend also to honourable senators a very fine article written by a member of the legislature, Bob Macquarrie, the M.L.A. from Yellowknife Centre in the Northwest Territories, responding to that editorial. He says:

We appeal to the Prime Minister and to provincial premiers to leave us with the right to look forward to responsible government and provincial status under the same terms and conditions that all other territorial/colonial peoples in Canada have enjoyed in the past.

We appeal to all Canadians to urge the Prime Minister and provincial premiers to get rid of clause 41(1)(f)—

He closes with these questions:

Do we ask for too much in asking that? Can we possibly respect the new constitution with its ringing call for freedom if what we ask is not granted?

I do not pretend that I have any special concern for the Northwest Territories or for the Yukon Territory, nor am I a specialist, but I feel that I would not be somehow fully respondent to the history of my own party, to the memory of John Diefenbaker and to the great work of people like Alvin Hamilton, if I did not find time to speak to these people who have not had an adequate voice in discussions so far. I appeal with all the strength at my command for support in this. It's not too late, as the evangelists say. It is never too late. By lifting those two small sections we will then be able to say that we, at least, have provided justice for those who need it the most.

Finally—I almost said "finally, brethern" but I would not dare—finally, I get back to the same position that Senator Manning spelled out so well the other evening, as to what we do and say after we weigh all the pros and cons, after we use our best and most objective judgment, after we listen to our colleagues and after we read all the arguments. I think this is a very important debate. I would like to be able to say that this is our finest hour, and that I was never so happy in my life. Most of us prefer being happy rather than being doubtful or querulous. I do not suppose there are that many prospects for dancing in the street, but, metaphorically, it is a happy posture.

I look at what we are in the process of doing in this country, but I cannot rejoice. I cannot find it in my heart to rejoice, or in my hands to applaud, or in my mind to support. I ask if what we are doing is good enough for our country at this time. It will not surprise you if I say, honourable senators, that my major anxiety, beyond what I have said about the north, is the whole question of national unity. I hear people say "That's a pretty good bargain. Nine out of ten we got." But we all know that when the one left out is Quebec, it is not nearly as good as the mere mathematics might suggest—

● (1440)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie:—and no one makes it any better by saying "It's really nine and a half, and the rest are just a half." Down through the years we have known that the essential question has been the relationship between Quebec and the rest, or the rest and Quebec, whichever way we want to put it. It is not at all an accident that we see out yonder, on the lawn of Parliament Hill, statues not only of Macdonald and Cartier, but also of Baldwin and Lafontaine. It has been an endless story that great men realized that the unity and co-operation of the two groups was of the essence. That is why I support the amendments of Senator Roblin and Senator Tremblay, and endorse, with all the ardour at my command, the words of Senator Smith on Friday when he asked whether there was anything better we could do than help those who are waging in Quebec the battle for Canada; was there anything better we could do to help those people than to avoid giving comfort and weapons of argument to those who would destroy this country. Those were highly perceptive words and I have no difficulty in answering.

These are troubled times. Senator Bird invoked Tom Paine. They are troubled times in Canada. There is political and social turbulence, and economic challenge that is perhaps almost overwhelming. Certainly there is turbulence within Quebec, and angry sounds are emanating from that province. We note the discord even within parties. The Premier of Quebec is suffering the slings and arrows of his discontented supporters, and Claude Ryan—a man I have known for many years, and honoured and respected—faces troubles. Perhaps it is a question of one getting the arrows in front, and the other the knives behind. It is a difficult time in that province. But who is to say that out of that turmoil, that uncertainty, that restlessness, something new and helpful might not develop?

Some of the things that I see developing are not particularly wholesome. I am not getting into Quebec politics, but I noticed that someone paid money for inserting a newspaper ad calling the members of Parliament in that province traitors. They are not traitors. They may be wrong from time to time, and many of them are wrong politically, but they are not traitors; they are fine men and women, trying to do their best. That sort of thing is no good; it is not good to resort to that sort of vituperation.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

As I followed the Parti Québécois meeting, I was thinking of the old poem that people of my generation were brought up on, Lays of Ancient Rome. I suppose that most people here are too young to know it. We read about when Horatius was defending the bridge against the great Etruscan army:

But those behind cried "Forward!"

And those before cried "Back!"

The backroom boys wanted to rush forward into the fray, but Premier Lévesque, who has been "there," doesn't want to do that.

Another thing that went through my mind, as I looked at the face of the Premier of Quebec, is the old American expression: With friends like that, who needs enemies?

But, I repeat, it is an uncertain time, it is never a hopeless time, and in that uncertainty it would be most unwise to say there is no more time, that we cannot discuss anything further with anyone, that we cannot wait. The big question is still Quebec and the rest of us, and we must not, for one moment, pass any measure that might risk further widening of the gulf that exists between us. So long as Quebec is disquieted, alienated and apart, it is not the best course to say, "Full steam ahead."

There are enough people in this country who will exacerbate our differences and who will try to block the avenues of co-operation and understanding, but as for me, honourable senators, neither by voice nor vote will I take on the slightest chance of aiding confrontation or averting co-operation.

Hon. Paul Lucier: I wonder if the honourable senator will permit one or two questions.

Senator Perrault: Of course he will.

Senator Lucier: I have a problem understanding his position in moving an amendment to paragraphs 42(1)(e) and (f) concerning the two territories. First, I should like to know if the honourable senator has discussed this with his present leader. As I stated in my remarks last Thursday, the position of Joe Clark, the then Prime Minister, was quite clear. There was no doubt about his position, which was that all premiers had to agree before the Yukon Territory became a province. Is this a Joe Clark flip-flop, is it a party flip-flop, or is it something that the honourable senator is doing on his own?

Concerning my other question, the Prime Minister was told that he did not have provincial agreement on many things and that he should go back and get that agreement. One of the conditions of provincial agreement was that paragraphs (42)(1)(e) and (f) should be put in. Is the honourable senator now suggesting that we should say, "To hell with the premiers," and that we should remove paragraphs 42(1)(e) and (f) against their wishes?

You were the ones who said, "Go and get their consent." We went and got it—this was one of the conditions of it—and you are now saying, "Take this out; don't listen to the premiers; they don't know what they are talking about."

Senator Smith: Is the honourable senator making a speech?

Senator Lucier: I am not making a speech. I am simply asking some questions, but if I wish to make a speech, I will not ask the honourable senator's permission. I should like to know whether or not this is the new position of the Conservative Party.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would hardly presume to be the new father of the Conservative Party. I can answer the honourable senator's first question quite easily. The amendment which I have just put forward, for the support of the Senate, is precisely and exactly the amendment which Mr. Clark voted for in the other place a few days ago. So far as I know, he has never brought before either house of Parliament any document which looked like section 42, or the items thereof to which I refer.

Concerning the other matter, I have always believed it is quite wrong and improper, and indeed unconstitutional, for the federal government to be moving into areas which are in the provincial jurisdiction, and that is why my colleagues and I, for many weeks, have said that the unilateral approach was quite wrong because the document dealt with more than federal jurisdiction, and therefore should have had more than federal input.

I contend that the matter of creating new provinces is one for the federal government and the area concerned and is not, in my judgment, opened for provincial veto or jurisdiction. If you ask me whether the premiers think that also, I would say that they probably don't, but, of course, it is their responsibility to be wrong if they wish.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question. The honourable senator referred to section 47 and said that it had been put into this resolution. Would it not be more accurate to say that it was restored to the resolution? It was in the first resolution, and I believe it was numbered section 44. It was dropped from that resolution during the committee stage, and this really restores it. It is not put in as a brand new section.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my recollection of the framework of the literary exercise, which, when orated, became my speech, is that I began by saying that much had happened since we looked at the last document, and it was not in that last document.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, it is always a delight to hear and to listen to the Honourable Senator Macquarrie. In the last few moments, he has himself used the term "beautiful language." I submit that he is a master practitioner of beautiful language, but we should not be misled by his lilting metaphors and hyperboles. They are backed by sound and extensive historical knowledge and judgment, and long familiarity with pure parliamentary practices. I pay him this tribute. May I say now that I fully agree with the amendment that he has proposed.

• (1450)

The geography of this chamber compels me to turn my back constantly on another of our distinguished colleagues, Senator Manning, who has been named the first member of the Order of Excellence by his fellow citizens of Alberta. On the basis of his speech last Thursday evening, I think he fully deserves an accolade of excellence from his colleagues in this chamber, also.

Since, on the basis of language, I do not want to attempt to compete with the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, either in Gaelic or Anglo-Saxon, may I confine myself to the gallic form of expression for the next few minutes?

[Translation]

Honourable senators, at the end of the first week of November, 1981, Canadians were in a state of euphoria.

No more hurtful confrontations!

No more hollow, self-serving speeches!

No more political and often personal backbiting!

No more arbitrary time tables, no more artificial deadlines!

Let us celebrate! But what price agreement?

The answer came the following week: the exclusion and isolation of Quebec, the dissatisfaction among women throughout Canada, native peoples, francophones outside Quebec and anglophones in Quebec, the territorial governments, all those who believed in the sanctity of human life, directors of security services, specialists in criminal law and civil rights activists. What is going to be left of Canada and Canadian unity?

It was too early to celebrate, and we would probably have done better doing a bit of soul-searching.

We are presented with a document, a resolution that claims to be the cornerstone of the Canadian Constitution and to defend the rights and freedoms of Canadians.

In fact, this document is much weaker and far less complete than the one proposed earlier this year, which I could not support at the time.

The document lacks any sign of maturity, as shown by the reactions of the groups I enumerated just now.

In addition, we have the "notwithstanding" band-aid clause. Notwithstanding the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, these may be amended or abrogated freely by any legislature.

Quebec is isolated. No doubt this is due to the clumsy, awkward and inept approach of the leader of the government of this province, whose stated objective is to dismember my country.

And no doubt he was driven, and perhaps encouraged, to act in this manner by the other ten whose attitudes were as outrageous and intransigent as his.

The game was not worth the candle.

I can understand why some of us want to have an entrenched Charter of Rights at any price. They feel it is a symbol we should have, although every day its ineffectiveness is proved behind the Iron Curtain, and we have no guarantee it will be effective in Canada.

I can understand why some of us are willing to overlook the shortcomings of this document in order to gain some of the specific points they are so anxious to see included.

However, I do not agree that Canadians should have to settle for second best where the Constitution of this country is concerned.

I would have preferred the status quo ante.

I agree with patriation. I agree with the amending formula, including Clause 47, for the reasons stated earlier by Senator Hicks.

Patriation with an amending formula is supposed to attenuate the dissatisfaction we have felt for over a decade because of the fact that the Canadian Constitution is a made-at-Westminster document. However, if the present government and the present Parliament commit Canadians to a Charter of Rights and Freedoms that is to be ratified at Westminster and there granted, given or acknowledged, does this not mean that the next generation or the generation after will experience much the same dissatisfaction we are anxious to remove today?

I am afraid so, and I want no part of it.

Soon we shall have patriated the Constitution and the amending mechanism. After that, and without further ado, we can proceed to draft an improved Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Therefore, for reasons I gave on April 24 of this year and expanded further today, I cannot support the present resolution.

[English]

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, in March last I spoke on the proposed resolution which dealt with the same subject matter as does the resolution now before us. At that time I opposed that resolution on three main grounds.

First, I thought that Parliament should have been concerning itself with a more urgent matter, namely, the dismal state of the economy. Secondly, I felt that a Canadian Charter of Rights should have been passed in Canada, not in England. There is, however, no point in discussing those two objections now. The economy is still in a dismal and, indeed, a deplorable state; and the British Parliament is to be asked to give us a Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

My third and most important objection to that resolution was that it did not give any protection to the unborn child—the child conceived but not yet born. It failed to give any protection to those who needed it most. It failed to give the right to life itself to these unborn children. It failed to give these children the right to be born alive.

Honourable senators, the resolution we are debating now is no better. It has all the faults of the former resolution insofar as the unborn are concerned. In its present form it is unacceptable to a great many people, but can be made more acceptable by the adoption of the amendment to section 7, moved by Senator Sullivan, which I was proud to second. What does that amendment do? In essence, it means that the word "Everyone," used in section 7, includes the right of a child conceived but not born. In other words, it gives the protection of that section to such children as well as to those already born.

[Senator Lafond.]

Indirectly, it would prevent, I hope, the senseless massacre of the innocent which has taken place in Canada every year—indeed, every day.

● (1500)

Honourable senators, I support the amendment which was proposed by the Honourable Senator Sullivan. I support it because I object—just as strongly as I can—to the fact that the proposed Charter gives no protection to the unborn child. Indeed, it excludes the very right to live of such children. In effect it says to them, "If you are lucky enough to be born, the law will protect you."

Honourable senators, I believe that a child which has been conceived has a natural, a fundamental, a God-given right to be born. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not acknowledge that right and, by that fact, in effect it denies the God-given right to live to those who are unable to speak for themselves.

Honourable senators, I say to you that in my opinion the commandment "Thou shalt not kill" is as valid today as it was when God first gave it to Moses. I believe abortion is simply the killing of innocent children.

It has always seemed to me to be ironic that the state would not deprive a murderer of his freedom, much less his life, without giving to him the full protection of that law—he must be tried before a judge and jury; he must be represented by competent legal counsel; his guilt must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt—and it is only right and proper that this should be done. And yet, honourable senators, no such protection is given to the unborn before they are killed. Perhaps some people feel that adequate protection is now given under our law. In my opinion, that protection—if it can be described as such—means little or nothing. I think statistics prove that.

The law relating to abortion was amended in 1969. Under that amendment, abortion was permitted if an abortion committee was of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life or the health of the pregnant woman. Such committees have been set up in 265 hospitals in Canada. I would be surprised if anyone would now claim that such committees mean anything. Certainly, the protection they afford is less than that given to a person charged with murder. The committee takes the role of both judge and jury, and no legal counsel appears on behalf of the unborn child—a child who is accused of no crime. To say that such committees, after hearing the evidence by way of a formal hearing, have decided that the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life or health of the pregnant woman is stretching credulity beyond the limit of credibility. People may be gullible but they are not that gullible.

Let us look at the statistics for a moment. I noticed a report in the Globe and Mail of last Tuesday which dealt with the number of abortions in Canada in 1980. In part, it stated that, according to the latest figures released by Statistics Canada, 265 hospitals with abortion committees performed 65,855 abortions in 1980. The conclusion was drawn that, because there was an increase of only 720 abortions in 1980 over 1979, the increase was beginning to level off. Therefore, honourable senators, I suppose we can expect that there will be between 65,000 and 70,000 abortions each year in Canada, which is a truly horrifying prospect—one that I would term an annual massacre of the innocents.

Honourable senators, until Canada's abortion law was changed in 1969, the only ground for abortion was the danger to the life of the mother. There were under 12,000 abortions performed in that year, which was then considered high. The amended law permitted hospitals to establish committees of at least three doctors who could authorize an abortion if the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life or health of the pregnant woman.

Since there were 65,855 abortions authorized and performed in Canada in 1980, there must have been an awful lot of unhealthy Canadian women. Indeed, a visitor from another land studying our abortion law might well come to the conclusion that some kind of disease—a plague of epidemic proportions—was prevalent in Canada which, by a strange coincidence, only attacked and afflicted pregnant women.

Honourable senators, I believe that the concern felt by many people about this abortion matter is well expressed, in a press release of February 9 last, by a group of doctors known as Canadian Physicians for Life. I quote, in part, from that press release:

We Canadian Physicians for Life and active members of the Canadian Medical Association count ourselves among those who are becoming increasingly impatient with the unrelenting way that those who wield power in our society appear to be moving towards the devaluation of human life.

It states further:

Since World War II we have witnessed the erosion of values which has accelerated particularly in the last decade, and although the erosion of values is evident in several spheres, we address ourselves to one specific aspect of this erosion, pertinent to our profession, i.e., the increasing destruction of human life through abortion.

The statement pointed out that approximately half a million abortions had been performed since 1969. It further stated that the wholesale and extensive abortion on demand practised across the land represents the destruction of perfectly normal babies in perfectly normal mothers with perfectly normal pregnancies, for no other reason than the social wish or even convenience of the mother. I have one further quotation.

Let us make no mistake about it, abortion is a criminal act, described as such in the Criminal Code of Canada, which has been decriminalized under certain defined circumstances. Lawmakers have, in fact, made killing legal under these circumstances. Paradoxically, a murderer's life is well protected by due process of law in an "advanced" society. His life is not forfeit because this is deemed "cruel and unusual punishment" or "uncivilized". Yet our unborn children are destroyed through the quasi-judicial function of a tribunal of doctors, without legal representation, and have no real protection under the law.

Honourable senators, it is good to know that such a well-informed group as the Canadian Physicians for Life are speaking out so strongly and so well on behalf of the unborn child.

I have heard it stated and I have read that the Charter of Rights does not give the right to life to the unborn because it takes a neutral attitude on this most important matter. Can you imagine, honourable senators, that there could be a neutral attitude on a matter of life or death? To me, it is simply incomprehensible that such an argument could be seriously advanced or seriously considered. I fail to see how there can be neutrality where matters of principle are concerned.

• (1510)

Honourable senators, I have a further objection to the resolution in its present form, and that is its treatment of the province of Quebec. I think it was a serious mistake for the federal government and the other provinces to proceed with this resolution without the concurrence of Quebec. I believe it will give to those in Quebec who wish to separate from Canada an emotional argument which they can use to further their contention that Quebec should separate. I believe it should be recognized that, beginning in 1867, Quebec has had a special and, indeed, a unique place in our Confederation. I think that is as it should be, because without Quebec there would have been no Confederation. I can readily understand that the decision to proceed with the resolution without the concurrence of Quebec might well cause resentment there, because it does look as though the English-speaking provinces and the federal government have united to push the resolution through regardless of the opposition of the Government of Quebec. I realize the federal position is that the people of Quebec favour the resolution and that only the Quebec government is against it. I hope that is correct, but it is a dangerous approach or position to take with respect to the future of federal-provincial relations. Indeed, it sets a most unwise precedent.

Back in January of this year the Assembly of the Catholic Bishops of Quebec issued a statement in reference to the former resolution. I think their words should also apply here, although I do not know if they have made any statements regarding the present resolution.

According to the press, the bishops are reported to have held the position that any constitution must be the expression of a common outlook on life and of values fundamentally accepted by the people as a whole. One press report quoted the bishops as follows:

We cannot imagine how social peace can be reached on the basis of a Constitution which has not gained the consent of the contracting parties, and of the major partners in government. Such peace would then be even less possible within Canada, since according to the spirit of Confederation and the tradition of the Courts, any substantial change to the Constitution requires the consent of Quebec for reasons rooted in the basic duality of the country.

Honourable senators, as I have said, that statement refers to the former resolution but since it expresses my feeling on the present resolution I make those words my own.

As I mentioned before, honourable senators, I support the amendment moved by Senator Sullivan. That amendment would make a short but significant and important change in section 7 of the Charter. I would like you to hear it once more:

7. Everyone, including the unborn child, has the right to life, which life begins at conception and which right is assertable from the moment of conception. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Honourables senators, I believe the failure of the proposed Charter to give to the unborn the right to life is a fatal defect and omission; but it is an omission which can be corrected by the adoption of this amendment. Consequently, I urge its adoption by the Senate.

So far as I am personally concerned, I would never vote for a charter that did not give to the unborn a right to life from the moment of conception to the moment of natural death.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I feel privileged to be able to participate in this historic constitutional debate. Although the Constitution has been discussed on and off for the past 54 years, and, I suggest, debated intensively for the past two decades, clarity on this issue has not been forthcoming. At least, in my view that is unfortunately the case. Indeed, even today many Canadians are confused about exactly what we are discussing in Parliament. I hope that today I can shed some light on this extremely important question.

Senator Flynn: We have been waiting for that for 50 years.

Senator Olson: I notice that the Leader of the Opposition joins with me in hoping that I shed some light on it.

The resolution before this house is easier to understand and, I think, to support enthusiastically if honourable senators recognize what it is and what it is not. What is the nature of the resolution we are discussing? It represents many things: first, it is a major step in Canada's ongoing constitutional development; second, it is a final step in the achievement of the full independence of Canada; third, it is a prerequisite to making further constitutional adjustments here in Canada as required from time to time.

As I stated, honourable senators, this resolution represents a further major step in Canada's ongoing constitutional evolution that began with Confederation in 1867. Let us go back and review not all but just a small part of that history.

• (1520)

In 1864, the political leaders in the British North American colonies—from the Canadas (Canada West and Canada East), Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland—met in an attempt to build a country. At Charlottetown and later at Quebec City, they hammered out a number of resolutions that would form the basis of this new country. Their resolutions, later passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom as the British North America Act, founded the Dominion of Canada.

The B.N.A. Act, based on the Quebec Resolutions, was not a perfect document, and our Fathers of Confederation recognized that fact. I shall not read into the record any of the speeches made by the Fathers of Confederation, but certainly some of them recognized at that time that the document was not perfect and complete in terms of the full independence or sovereignty of a new nation. Two colonies, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, found the accord unacceptable and refused to sign the agreement reached at Quebec City. The leaders of the other colonies, however, went ahead and asked Britain to pass their resolutions, with the proviso that in the future other British North American colonies could join their new country. Britain agreed, passed the B.N.A. Act, which gave legal effect to the colonial accord and explicitly made provision for other colonies in British North America to join the Dominion of Canada at a later date. As time passed, the colonies made use of this provision and did join Confederation—British Columbia in 1871, Prince Edward Island in 1873, and Newfoundland in 1949.

Wisely, the Fathers of Confederation not only made provision for existing colonies to join their new country, but also included a clause which would allow Canada to take over the vast Northwest Territories. In 1870, the Dominion made use of this constitutional provision and bought the northwest from the Hudson's Bay Company, and at the same time created the Province of Manitoba. In 1880, Canada acquired the Arctic Islands and in 1905 it created the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. I think that the people of this country should bear in mind this history when they express their criticism of this resolution, because no one is arguing that it is perfect. In other words, the dream of building the Canada we know today was conceived in 1867, but was not completed in a territorial sense until 1949, when Newfoundland joined Confederation.

In 1867, the Fathers of Confederation laid the basis for other forms of constitutional evolution in the B.N.A. Act. For example, in 1867 Canada did not even have a Supreme Court. The Liberal government of Alexander Mackenzie established the Supreme Court of Canada in 1875 and, finally, in 1949 it became the highest court in our country when appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Great Britain were abolished.

In another area, that of external affairs, Canada has been developing its own international personality since 1867. In 1881 we sent our first High Commissioner to Great Britain. In 1921 Canada negotiated and signed, in her own name, the Halibut Treaty with the United States. In 1927 we sent our first ambassador abroad—Vincent Massey, to the United States. In 1931, with the passage of the Statute of Westminster by the British Parliament, Canada achieved full autonomy in her external relations, a right that was underlined in 1939, when Canada declared war, in her own right, one week after the United Kingdom declared war against Germany. These historic events are merely the most significant in Canada's evolution from colony to independent nation.

In almost every area Canada has been undergoing progressive constitutional change since 1867. In 1867 there was no such thing as Canadian citizenship. Slowly, over a period time, Canadians came to recognize the importance of such a notion, and in 1946 Parliament passed the Canadian Citizenship Act which, incidentally, was resisted by many, and they used the same reasons and arguments that we are hearing today. These people thought it was undesirable to give Canadian citizens the right to be called Canadian citizens as opposed to what they had been called until that time, British subjects. Yet, we no longer hear those arguments, and it is simply because of the evolution of Canada as a maturing nation.

I think a similar type of evolution has occurred in the area of national symbols. In 1867, our national anthem, O Canada, had not even been written. From the time it was composed and publicly presented at Quebec City on June 24, 1880, O Canada gradually won the hearts of Canadians and was officially adopted as our country's national anthem in 1980, 100 years later. A similar story can be told about our flag. Since 1867 Canadians had worked and fought under a number of banners until finally, in 1965, Parliament adopted the Maple Leaf flag.

The story is similar, again, in the area of human rights and freedoms. Honourable senators are well aware of the struggle after Confederation to obtain the franchise for women. As far as federal elections were concerned, Parliament granted women the right to vote in 1918. Women were declared persons by the courts in 1929, and thus secured the right to sit in this very chamber. Over the years several attempts were made to enshrine our rights in statute. Several of the provinces took this step, beginning with Saskatchewan in 1947. The Diefenbaker government passed the Canadian Bill of Rights in 1960 in an attempt to provide all Canadians with the same rights and freedoms within the federal government's area of jurisdiction, no matter where they lived in our country. Now, a further step is required to ensure that individual Canadians have the same rights vis-à-vis all levels of government. The present constitutional resolution attempts to take that next step.

Honourable senators, in presenting these examples, I have been trying to show that our Constitution has not remained static. Rather, it has been evolving or changing slowly over the years. In their wisdom, the Fathers of Confederation realized that they were not writing a document that was to be frozen in time. They knew full well that they were writing a Constitution that would be flexible and would allow for more change. Indeed, many of the Fathers at the time of Confederation foresaw when Canada would reach the stage of constitutional evolution we have attained today, complete independence and full sovereignty.

What is the nature of the present constitutional resolution before Parliament? This resolution is another major step; indeed, the final step on the path to complete nationhood that we have been following since 1867. But the resolution represents something more. By working out an acceptable amending formula, we will be able to make adjustments to our Constitution, in Canada, from time to time, as circumstances warrant. Like the Fathers of Confederation before us, we are not patriating a Constitution that will be static, but one that will permit adjustment and change, when necessary and desirable, in the future. All the provinces agree to that. This is the first time in our history that we can patriate our Constitution.

● (1530)

When the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed the Statute of Westminster in 1931, the British were willing to recognize Canada's independence, and grant her full sovereignty. Canadians, however, realized that there was no point in proceeding with patriation unless, at the same time, the provinces and the national government agreed on an amending formula. Simple patriation would place Canadians in a constitutional strait jacket.

In 1931, when Britain offered Canada complete independence, Prime Minister Bennett declined and asked that the Constitution remain in Britain until Canadians could work out an acceptable amending formula. In 1931, Prime Minister Bennett could not achieve unanimity, and the question of constitutional reform was set aside. The problem was allowed to fester. That has been the history of constitutional change in this country ever since. Every prime minister since the Right Honourable R.B. Bennett has desired patriation—I want to be fair about that—but none, until Prime Minister Trudeau, has had the courage and the perseverance to put a stop to our constitutional merry-go-round.

Some say patriation is not important. Honourable senators, to me it is important. It is extremely important. By patriating our Constitution, we are demonstrating that we have confidence in ourselves as a people and are determined to assume full responsibility for our every action.

We now have the opportunity to patriate our Constitution and bring it home with an amending formula that will allow us to make amendments once we have it here in Canada. Let us grasp the opportunity history is presenting to us.

If this resolution represents the first step in allowing us, as Canadians, to modify our Constitution in Canada, what does it not represent or pretend to be? In this regard, I must make the point that it seems to me that there are many extreme arguments put forth from time to time concerning what the Constitution is not; that is, it does not make an attempt to deal with many of the things that some people think it ought to deal with at this time. These people take the extreme position that, unless it deals with all those matters, we achieve nothing. They state that it is a guaranteed formula for doing nothing.

It does not represent the end of the constitutional discussion or change in this country. It is not perfect. Indeed, it is silent on matters affecting the division of powers between the federal and the provincial governments. It does not represent an end to discussions in this area. For example, the national government is actively negotiating jurisdictional control of our offshore resources with some of the provinces. In 1867, these resources were of no importance. Even until the last few years, they were not considered to be of any major consequence by either the federal or the provincial governments. They are now of vital concern, and some constitutional adjustment in this area, that will hopefully be acceptable to both the federal and the provincial governments, must be found. The present constitutional resolution does not decide this question but, through patriation with an amending formula, it will allow Canadians to settle this jurisdictional problem, by themselves, in Canada.

The present constitutional resolution does not attempt to settle other constitutional problems such as the question of jurisdiction over communications, family law, the nature of the Supreme Court, or the question of the federal declaratory power. However, the resolution will, again because of patriation and the amending formula, allow Canadians to resolve these questions themselves, and in Canada.

Besides not adjudicating federal-provincial jurisdictional conflicts, the resolution does not attempt to set down the totality of the rights and freedoms Canadians enjoy. As Canadians, we possess all kinds of human rights that will not be disturbed in any way by this resolution.

While attempting to fulfil the hope, expressed by many Canadians over the years, that our Constitution should protect our rights and freedoms, such as recognizing the equality between men and women as people, the resolution before us today does not disturb, in any way, other rights and freedoms we cherish. The right to the enjoyment of property is protected under our law at present, and will continue to be so. In effect, the Charter of Rights makes additions to our rights but does not take away any one of them.

As I stated at the outset of my remarks, honourable senators, this resolution represents a major step forward in the constitutional evolution of this country.

Some people argue that it does too much—that it imposes human rights and freedoms on the provinces. Others argue that it does not go far enough, particularly in the area of minority education and language rights.

What is forgotten in these arguments is that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is for people—for the individual Canadian. I uphold and respect the rights of individuals in this state. I support the enshrining of these rights in a charter above the reach of any legislative body—whether federal or provincial—in this country. If provinces were left to their own devices in this area, there would be no rights and freedoms common to all Canadians. To me that is important.

What is more important, in spite of all the arguments that have been made, is that the provincial legislatures do not have an honourable record in protecting the rights and freedoms of Canadians. I can show all kinds of examples where they have been violated terribly over the years. My remarks are not confined to one province either.

We have heard many speeches which, in my view, overstate the case in the extreme without focusing on the essential nature of the constitutional resolution before us today.

[Senator Olson.]

In conclusion, I feel certain that, if honourable senators recognize what the resolution is and what it signifies—that it is a major step forward in Canada's constitutional evolution—then all of them, on both sides of this chamber, will enthusiastically give it their support for what it is.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, while listening to the previous speaker, the Honourable Senator Olson, for a moment I thought I was young again and back in my history class listening to a lecture involving a series of dates. This brought to mind my history teacher, Dr. Lilly Seaman, and I looked up to see Senator Olson on his feet and recalled that Dr. Seaman did not have a beard. In addition, she presented history in a much more enlightened fashion.

I have often said that I would never hire Senator Olson as an economist and, after listening to him this afternoon, I do not think I would want to hire him as a historian either.

Senator Olson: I hope you will give me a few marks for common sense.

Senator Phillips: I will give you just a few marks.

Honourable senators, throughout the long debate on the Constitution, the government has conveyed the attitude that, when we patriate our Constitution, Canadians will be much better off, and that somehow or other we will have a much more prosperous future without unemployment and inflation. These things are attributed to the present Constitution.

Senator Olson: There you go overstating the case. That assertion has never been made.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, that assumption is completely wrong. If the Constitution is patriated, it will, in effect, do nothing for the potato producers in my province who are presently selling their produce at less than the cost of production. It will do nothing for the Newfoundland fishermen or the unemployed fish workers. It will in no way help the 15,000 unemployed forestry workers in New Brunswick; nor will it do anything to modernize and refinance the steel mill located in Cape Breton.

● (1540)

Honourable senators, I am pleased that we are coming to the final stage of this debate. I do not anticipate that my viewpoints will prevail in the final analysis, but I am glad it is nearly over, and I hope that on Wednesday afternoon the government will bring in some measures to deal with the economy, measures that they have neglected to bring in for the past 15 months, while we have fooled around with the Constitution.

Senator Olson: I can give you some good news, if you want it.

Senator Phillips: I would be delighted to have any good news. In fact, they do not even have to wait until Wednesday; they can do that tomorrow.

Senator Murray: Is there a new budget coming?

An Hon. Senator: Is there any budget?

Senator Phillips: In January instead of February, I would be delighted to have that.

Senator Olson: I will bring it in weekly, if you like.

Senator Phillips: That would be something like your interest rates, Senator Olson. Interest rates and a new budget every Thursday would be the ultimate achievement as far as this government is concerned.

I should also like to follow the customary practice of congratulating the mover, but I find it difficult to do so on this occasion because the mover of the resolution was really not that helpful. He threw congratulations around like confetti at a wedding, but he did not get to the resolution itself. He did not discuss the unexplained portions of the resolution, and that is what I expected of the Honourable Senator Perrault.

When the honourable gentleman finished his remarks, he assured the Honourable Senator Lang and others who had questions for him that he would answer all questions that arose during the debate when he was closing the debate. I do not think anyone believes that. I say that because the Honourable Senator Perrault has never been able to answer a question since he became Leader of the Government in the Senate. How will he now turn around and answer all the questions put to him before 5 o'clock tomorrow evening? That would require a major metamorphosis, and I do not think that the Honourable Senator Perrault can do that. That would require him to go full throttle for about 48 hours, and even at that I think he would still be unfinished.

The resolution before us brings about a new attitude regarding the Canadian Constitution, in that the courts will now start to interpret our Constitution to a far greater degree than they have in the past. I can assure honourable senators that the Supreme Court of Canada will be busy for at least the next 50 years interpreting this document.

The Honourable Senator Hicks referred to section 3 of the resolution, which says that every Canadian citizen has the right to vote and to be qualified for election to the House of Commons. Senator Hicks also referred to section 1, which states that any exceptions must be demonstrably justified by Parliament or a legislature; yet section 52, honourable senators, goes on to contradict section 1. It says that the Constitution is supreme and any other law will have to be justified vis-à-vis the Constitution.

Senator Hicks has already touched on the first problem that bothers me, the voting age. That section says that every Canadian is entitled to a vote. Senator Hicks then illustrated this by referring to certain provinces in which one has to be 17 years of age to vote, and other provinces in which one has to be 19 or 20 years of age to vote. This could raise a question regarding one's fundamental rights.

I should like to take that one step further, honourable senators. Let me take the case of a man or woman convicted of first degree murder who has to do 25 years in a penitentiary. Let us assume that he or she decides to be a candidate in the next general election.

Senator Buckwold: They would probably be elected.

Senator Phillips: That has happened in other parliaments, Senator Buckwold.

Let us suppose that there is something in the Canada Elections Act that prohibits that individual from running. He can then go before the Supreme Court of Canada and say that that interferes with his fundamental rights.

Honourable senators may think that that is extreme, but I point out to you that Bobby Sands, a convicted IRA terrorist, or murderer, depending on your interpretation, was a candidate and was elected to the British House of Commons while he was in prison. The British Parliament moved to prohibit future IRA convicted terrorists from being candidates for the British House of Commons. Can we, as a Parliament, move in that same fashion? I do not think we can.

Further, honourable senators, I point out that at each general election the leader of a party has to certify each candidate nominated as being acceptable to the leader of the party and to the party, in particular. I remind honourable senators that within recent memory Mr. Stanfield refused to accept Mr. Jones as a candidate because of his views on bilingualism. Would Mr. Stanfield have that right today?

I ask you what would happen if a member of the Rhinoceros Party won a nomination as a Liberal or an NDP candidate? I will resist the temptation to say that it would not be noticed, but I ask you whether Mr. Trudeau or Mr. Broadbent would have the right to refuse that individual today.

Parliament Hill is a great place for political humour. I have often thought I should like to write down the various puns and questions which I have heard during my 25 years on the Hill. One of my favourites during the constitutional debate arises out of a question asked about the present resolution. What would happen if a six-year-old Moslem girl complained about not being able to vote? How would the court decide that? Honourable senators, that may seem a bit far-fetched, but, basically, whoever posed that question was attempting to convey to us that there are a number of questions that are not adequately dealt with in this resolution, those being questions of age, religion, ethnic origin and sex.

Honourable senators, I ask you to stop and think for a moment as to whether or not we really have all those situations covered in the resolution. Admittedly, I am sure that those who drafted the resolution felt they are covered, but I question that very much.

Another problem I see arising out of the Charter of Rights is a conflict with the Official Languages Act. Presently, the act calls for an applicant for a position in the Public Service to indicate a willingness to undergo language training. Quite recently, Treasury Board decided that a number of positions will require the applicant to be already bilingual. It is not too difficult to imagine that being contested.

Many of the previous speakers have complained that the resolution is vague and poorly drafted. I am not a legal draftsman, but I would suggest that a lot of the vagueness in it is due to the fact that the resolution was not adopted or conceived at the conference table, but rather in a hotel room. The bureaucrats remained behind in the hotel room—and I wonder what was in the cigars they were smoking—and began phoning the premiers at various hours of the night asking, “Do you agree with this? Do you agree with that?” Honourable senators, I fear that some of the premiers agreed to certain items which they are unable to handle. There was insufficient time to study the drafting, and the reason for the federal government’s haste—and my colleague, Senator Macquarrie, this afternoon has emphasized the government’s haste—was a determination to get this resolution passed just in case Premier Lévesque changed his mind and agreed to co-operate.

A number of honourable senators have derived pleasure from having an entrenched Charter of Rights. I note the number of senators who previously objected to the Charter of Rights in the earlier resolution have now found some vague authority which gives them justification for changing their views.

Honourable senators, I ask you: Have we entrenched freedom of speech, freedom of religion and freedom of the press? Have we guaranteed property rights? I do not believe we have. When we speak of entrenching these rights, I suggest to you, rather than entrenching them, we have covered them in a very shallow furrow. It is a furrow from a plough that is adjusted too high.

I am sure honourable senators have observed television and other press coverage of the Parti Québécois conference in Quebec this past weekend. I should like to make it perfectly plain that at no time would I suspect Premier Lévesque of interfering with any of the basic rights. I think he has shown this in the referendum. However, honourable senators, down the road someone will follow Premier Lévesque just as someone will follow every politician on the Hill. I ask you to consider the type of people present as observers at that meeting. Guerillas from South America, or any other part of the world, are not my type of Canadians. Yet, those people were present as observers at the Parti Québécois conference.

What are we doing in this resolution? We are handing some future generation, which has no respect for those rights we have inherited from the common law, no respect for freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and freedom of association—none whatsoever, because most of them have been trained in an atmosphere in which that is not accepted—we are handing them, on a silver platter, the legal means to oppose opposition. We are passing the “notwithstanding” clause which means that Parliament—not only Quebec but every other legislature in Canada—not by a two-thirds majority or any other protective means, but by one vote, can remove our basic freedoms. Honourable senators, is this the type of Constitution you want? It is not the type I want.

I wondered why the Prime Minister spent so much time in Africa last summer. Could it be that he was studying how the one-party system evolved in the emerging nations of Africa?

The omission of women’s rights in the original resolution introduced in the House of Commons has left many Canadians dissatisfied. Admittedly, the House of Commons attempted to correct those omissions, but I do not believe the error has been fully corrected, and it has certainly not been accepted by the general public. Many women’s groups, native groups and the handicapped still express their opposition.

● (1600)

I doubt that I can add very much to what has already been said, but I should like to leave honourable senators with a few figures regarding those who are dissatisfied with the Charter of Rights. Women represent 52 per cent of Canada’s population; natives, 6.3 per cent; and the handicapped, 11.6 per cent. If we add the 25 per cent or more that represent the population of Quebec, I ask the question: How many people are satisfied with the present Charter of Rights?

Throughout my experience in this chamber I have noticed that when it came to rights and constitutions, government supporters were always quick to refer to the attitude of the Honourable Eugene Forsey. His was the ultimate wisdom when supporting the government; yet today that same gentleman is supporting, in his attitude, the groups I have just mentioned. It is strange, honourable senators, but I have not heard one supporter of the resolution refer to Eugene Forsey.

Senator Bird: I believe I referred to him.

Senator Phillips: I am sorry, Senator Bird. I was present for the beginning of your remarks, but then had to leave the chamber. Perhaps you did refer to him. I would ask whether you referred to him in the sense of supporting the resolution?

Senator Bird: I said that I feared he might have been right in what he had been saying, but I had been convinced by the honourable senators who spoke before me on the same day that my apprehension was unfounded.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, the fact that, with the lone exception of Senator Bird, our former colleague has suddenly been dropped, is persona non grata, tells us something about the Charter of Rights. It is all right when you are supporting it, but don’t speak out against it because you will have no support.

Language rights have occupied the attention of the Senate throughout the debate. Senator Tremblay and others have discussed the subject in a calm and reasoned manner, and it is not my intention to repeat those views. But along the same line, I will mention briefly the fact that in the Constitution the right to an education is not mentioned except when it refers to minority groups. Surely the children of the majority have the same right as those of minority. It does not matter in which province one lives, or whether one is anglophone or francophone, all children should have the same right. But nowhere is it mentioned that the children of the majority are entitled to an education at public expense.

There are many things in Canada that we enjoy in common. In my opinion, this document completely misses those points that we share in common. Instead, we have devised a document that attempts to stitch together those things that divide us. It is very much like attempting to repair a sail. We have taken a canvas sail from the period of 1867 and we are attempting to stitch to it the nylon sail of today. Honourable senators, the first time a strong breeze or a gale hits that sail, it will give way at the weakest point, namely, the stitching.

Equalization has been included in the resolution in the form of a commitment to promote equal opportunity. Anyone who observed the November 12 budget and noted the reduction in transfer payments to the provinces will hardly be impressed by section 3. The meeting of federal and provincial finance ministers in Halifax just about destroyed any faith the provinces will have in section 3. The section is nothing more than a commitment to equalization and regional disparities.

Honourable senators, this government was elected on a commitment to low interest rates. If a commitment to equalization and regional disparities is made with the same sincerity as the commitment to low interest rates, then section 3 is meaningless.

Senator Walker has moved an amendment to delete section 47. He has noted that the section appears to be an afterthought. I recall being present at a meeting of the joint committee on the previous resolution when Senator Austin questioned Premier Blakeney who appeared as a witness. I regret that the honourable senator is not present in the chamber to confirm this. On being questioned concerning the Senate, the Premier of Saskatchewan, an NDP premier, stated that he recognized the need for a bicameral system, that he recognized the need for a Senate. He went on to say that the Senate today was performing its defined function very well. I do not know whether Premier Blakeney or Senator Austin have gone through some mental aerobics, but we suddenly find this section inserted late in the bill—as Senator Walker described it—as an afterthought.

Honourable senators, I know that changes are required, and that changes in the Senate will come about. I accept that. But I would point out to honourable senators that section 47 not only prohibits us from dealing with any future constitutional amendments regarding the Senate, but, in fact, takes us out of the picture regarding any future constitutional amendments on anything. If we want to amend one specific item that does not involve the Senate, all that the House of Commons has to do is to wait six months and it is through.

● (1610)

I would point out to you that the real need for reform lies in the whole of Parliament. I think the majority of members of this chamber, as well as the other place, would agree that they no longer have any say. Both the House of Commons and the Senate can make recommendations ad nauseam, but such recommendations do not have to be accepted. The Prime Minister and about five cabinet ministers, plus a host of bureaucrats, now run this country. It is rather a sad commentary on both houses of Parliament, but it is true. The real need for reform lies in the whole parliamentary system. I do not object to parliamentary reform; I merely ask why this chamber is selected. Why not do the whole thing holus-bolus, and do it right? Offering Senate reform, when the country is suffering from legislative malnutrition, honourable senators, is like offering a patient suffering from malnutrition a facelift, so that he or she will not appear so thin.

Most Canadians feel a sense of disappointment at Quebec's being isolated in this resolution. It is a concern that is growing daily, and, in fact, that concern increases each time Canadians see a confrontation between the Prime Minister and the Premier of Quebec. The motion moved by Senator Flynn, I think, in a way, attempted to suggest a cooling-off period, but perhaps it did not go far enough. I would suggest that probably both of them should be sent to a monastery of silence, to let the country have a moratorium on announcements.

The Prime Minister states that he went into the November conference with the idea that he had to trick Premier Lévesque, and he boasts that he succeeded. Then he went on to complain that the Premier of Quebec did not trust him. That should be nothing new to the right honourable gentlemen. On the other hand, the Premier of Quebec went into the conference with no idea of achieving a new Constitution, for he does not want a new Constitution; he wants out of any Canadian Constitution. That certainly creates a very difficult situation.

When I first came to Parliament Hill, Prime Minister Diefenbaker was attempting to solve certain problems with Quebec. The federal treasury had certain moneys that were held in, shall we say, escrow for the Province of Quebec in the form of university grants. Quebec was unwilling to accept those from a previous government because they constituted an interference in the field of education, which Quebec maintained was theirs and theirs alone. This situation was resolved by paying the grants direct to the province, and letting the province distribute them. This pattern appears to have worked very well, because later on Liberal governments used it.

I point out that now we have the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans. The plans are integrated, but administered according to the special needs of Quebec. I would also remind the chamber that various premiers of Quebec, of different political viewpoints—Johnson of the Union Nationale, Lesage of the Liberal Party, and Bourassa of the Liberal Party—have also used this method of settling disputes with Ottawa.

During the referendum in Quebec, the Prime Minister promised a new Constitution. He gave no details, but he promised a new Constitution, and this is the basis for the resolution before us today. But, honourable senators, are we now to say to Quebec, "You voted for Canada, and all we are going to give you is a slap in the face. You can no longer opt out of any future federal agreement except in the two instances specified in this resolution"? Is this our response to Quebec for staying with us in the referendum? I hope we can do better than that.

Honourable senators, before closing, I would like to mention briefly two points. One is the amendment moved by my colleague from Prince Edward Island this afternoon. Incidentally, may I just digress for a moment and say that although I have often disagreed with Senator Macquarrie, I have often been proud of him. I was really proud of him in his speech today.

Senator Macquarrie referred to the veto that the provinces have over any future admissions to the Canadian Confederation. I think that is totally and completely wrong. No province should have a complete veto over the future of Canada; and it is indeed not only the future of the territories that is at stake, but the future of Canada. I consider it to be basically wrong for a province such as mine, the smallest, to be able to say that the Yukon cannot become a province also, and the people of my province do not wish that veto.

The press, it seems to me, has conveyed the idea that the western provinces want to expand northwards. I do not see that as the basis of the veto, despite the editorial read by Senator Macquarrie. I suggest to you that there is another reason. In the province of New Brunswick there is an active movement among the Acadians to have their own separate province. In northern Ontario there is also an active movement calling for the separation of northern Ontario from southern Ontario. I suggest that the reason this clause is in the resolution is simply to protect the two premiers who were hand-maidens to the Prime Minister throughout the constitutional debate.

The resolution also, in clause 50, gives control over non-renewable resources to the provinces. Honourable senators, I ask you: Will the word "province" define the boundaries? Will the word "province" include the oil fields off the Atlantic coast? Will the word "province" define the ownership of a future oil discovery in James Bay or Hudson Bay? I think we should clearly understand where the territory of the coastal provinces begins and where it terminates.

● (1620)

Honourable senators, in closing I ask you to consider these points. The Charter of Rights is not entrenched. In fact, it is nothing more than a legal means to destroy the rights we already have. I ask you to consider our slap in the face to the Province of Quebec. It is not the PQ government that we are hitting, honourable senators, it is every resident of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: That's right!

Senator Phillips: I am sure that the members of this chamber would not wish to do that. I ask you, honourable senators, to consider all of the vague definitions in this resolution that must be interpreted by the Supreme Court. Do you want a Constitution that, in the words of the advertisement, "turn turtle" every five years? I would like to think that we could do much better than that. I hope that you will join with me in opposing the resolution.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted a question, I should like some clarification. Senator Phillips referred to a six-year-old Moslem girl and to some doubt as to whether or not she would be eligible to vote under section 3. I do not think the fact that because she is a Moslem or a girl would in itself deny her that right. However, did the honourable senator consider the effect of section 1 of the resolution, which states:

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantee the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

Would that not take care of the fact that she is six years old? Would that not be a reasonable limitation which would permit legislation prohibiting her from voting?

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am somewhat like Senator Godfrey in that I have a very limited knowledge of the law. I would not presume to take the place of a justice of the Supreme Court and answer that question. I was referring to the question raised by Senator Hicks. I would also refer the honourable senator to section 52(1), which states:

The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

I would also like to remind the honourable senator that I presented that as something I overheard in the cafeteria on the fifth floor. I think it raises a lot of questions. I may say that I particularly enjoyed it because it came from a member of the staff, which convinced me that the public is studying the Constitution. I am pleased about that.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have another question. Reference was also made to Senator Macquarrie's amendment to the resolution, and Senator Phillips indicated that the present effect of the resolution with regard to making a territory into a province was subject to the veto of a single province. Surely section 38(1) requires three provinces to have any such veto.

Senator Phillips: Unlike Senator Godfrey, I did not follow my notes too closely. I may have wandered from them slightly, but whether it is the veto of three provinces or one is not really that important. In my opinion, the principle of a veto is completely in error. I would point out to Senator Godfrey that the Prime Minister is adamant in telling the Premier of Quebec that he does not have a veto over the present Constitution and, if he does not have such a veto, why should he have a veto over the future admission of provinces?

[Translation]

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, about a year ago when the resolution for the repatriation of our constitution was tabled in this House, I had shown very little support for it for reasons which I considered paramount. Today, these reasons are still valid. First, there is the fact of course that my own province, Quebec, is not party to the Accord. It could be said that it is the government of the province of Quebec, rather than the people of the province, which refuses to sign the Accord.

Secondly, I objected to clause 44 which indirectly has to do with the elimination of the Senate. Today my objection does not hold since clause 47 was substituted to it, under which an amendment to the constitution can be made after 180 days instead of 90 days. I am not sure that this is an important issue because in recent years the Senate has been docile in following the party line, and has not acted like an objective body.

Thirdly, I am not happy to see—I should add that I am even disenchanted—that the everlasting Conservative Ontario government make a deal with the everlasting Liberal federal government, under which section 133 of the B.N.A. Act does not apply to Ontario. Although the Government of Ontario has been progressive in its thinking, and anxious to co-operate in its treatment of the French language in that province, Premier Davis's anxiety to see power retained in central Canada does not justify such a deal.

In my opinion, cynicism and hypocrisy are quite evident in these dealings. We all know that the game of politics is a serious one; however, there are times where principles should override opportunism. I noticed with great delight that several members of various parties in the House of Commons agreed with that argument.

Fourthly, the incorporation in this resolution of the Charter of Rights is a matter of grave concern to me. Many of my friends who are prominent lawyers have expressed the view that we are entrenching incomplete rights which will make the process of change difficult.

These rights do not meet the wishes of the French-speaking people or the English-speaking people, nor those of the native peoples, the ethnic groups, the women, and the Government of the Northwest Territories. In fact, most of those people are unhappy with it.

● (1630)

[English]

Lastly, as one of the vanishing Protestant representatives of the Province of Quebec in this chamber, I have been deeply concerned with the lot of Quebec minorities. Our position there, since the passage of Bill 101 in Quebec, has become affected to a degree of which I do not think the majority of the people in Canada have the slightest idea.

Bill 101 was introduced in Quebec for the very laudable purpose of preserving the French culture and language. That is an aim which non-francophones can understand, appreciate and support. It suggests that the language of work and of matters of culture should be clearly established as French, and that all public information and communication should be so formed that French is in the dominant position. It also establishes control over the language of education.

The administration has gone much further. There is an element of revenge, of hatred, of excess in the application of this law which is reminiscent of dictatorship.

An editorial in the Montreal Gazette in October headed "A Society in Danger," gives weight to this fact. From this article the following is a brief quotation:

Whether deliberately or not, the Quebec government's policies in education, language and public services are pulling the plug or are about to do so on the sustaining institutions that have kept the anglophone community alive and breathing.

Later there is this:

If anyone still doubts that the present government through either bureaucratic or vindictive instincts, represents a danger to anglophone institutions, let him read this week's newspapers.

So far excessively restrictive educational rules, curtailment of social services, the elimination of any English word from any public sign, the insistence on the French language only in anglophone institutions dealing only with a limited English constituency are the main causes of concern. And, incidentally, there are practically no anglophone employees in the Quebec civil service.

You know, it is a very short step from prohibiting a person from putting up a sign announcing his business in his own language to removing his right to advertise in his own language. In some countries it has progressed to control of the languages used in communicating via press, radio or television.

To indicate why non-francophone Quebecers are seriously concerned, let me give you a few examples of the extreme, almost ludicrous, activities of the special bureaucracy set up to police the language.

There is an organization in Quebec called "La Commission de surveillance de la langue française." The New York papers call it "The Language Police." Its attention was drawn to what it thought might be a subversive anglophone group called "The Little Red Playhouse." It is hard to believe, but the facts are as follows, according to the Montreal Gazette.

The Little Red Playhouse is situated in one room in Elizabeth Ballantyne School in Montreal West. That is an English Protestant school. It is a co-operative nursery school. It is not government-funded in any way. It operates on an annual budget of less than $20,000 and it is composed of three teachers and approximately 40 children three and four years of age.

In May of last year, the Little Red Playhouse was visited by two individuals from the language board who asked several questions about enrolment, and surveyed the classroom for French displays and literature. They requested a meeting with the executive to discuss further changes required by Bill 101.

Three weeks after the original visit, the registrar and the treasurer met with the language people who demanded that correspondence with parents of these babies be in French only; that the lease with the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal be in French; that application forms be in French only; that all suppliers be requested to send only French invoices; that all records—financial, minutes, et cetera—be maintained in French. The Little Red Playhouse was then given until January of this year to comply. Now, does that sound like Canada?

Let me give you another example. There are some English-speaking schools which carry normal identification on their buildings—"Westmount High School", "Roslyn School," and so on. Now the words "school" or "high school" have to be removed, leaving the buildings with signs, or their stonework, reading only "Westmount", "Westmount Park", "Roslyn", "Chateauguay Valley." It is hard to tell whether they are public baths or schools. But does this protect the French language?

Again, there have been cases where people living and working in the French language have been given tests that did not deal with their professional terminology. They were failed and, as a result, prohibited from continuing their employment as nurses or nurses' aids, and so forth. As calculated in the press, we are losing from Quebec doctors, engineers and other desirable trained citizens by a net exodus of 100,000 between 1966 and 1976, and 75,000 between 1976 and 1979. At that rate it will be well over 200,000 in 15 years.

It is now generally recognized that extremists in the present Quebec government would welcome the exodus of most of the million non-francophones living in Quebec. We are talking about one million people in a province of six million people. These one million people are not being protected by the proposed Charter of Rights. Incidentally, that number is greater than the population of five of our provinces.

Quebec's premier in 1977 indicated that, if other provinces made provision for French education where numbers warranted, Quebec would be glad to act equally. Now that promise seems to be forgotten. The newest worry for the minority is a proposal by the Quebec government that would reduce the autonomy of their school boards.

It is now absolutely clear and declared that the present Quebec government is committed irrevocably to separation. It will not agree to any federal Constitution, no matter how changed or how permissive of opting in or opting out.

Honourable senators, it has been said in this debate that the present constitutional resolution is a great improvement over the original. I agree. There is no doubt about that. It has a language provision for French education in all of the provinces, although it does not give equal treatment to the English minority in Quebec. It recognizes the existence of native peoples with aboriginal rights, but to a limited extent only. It improves certain other rights which have been demanded outside and inside Parliament over the last year, and it now has nine provincial premiers prepared, even if reluctantly, to accept it.

● (1640)

I know that the resolution will pass. It should be a matter for jubilation that finally we have our own Constitution at home. Unfortunately, my feeling is one of considerable concern, that this is not the time for dancing in the streets. I believe we have created for ourselves years of litigation and more problems today than we had yesterday. I resent the fact that the government should have attempted to put through this policy by a unilateral end-run last year to get it passed before anybody was awakened to what was happening. The year's forced delay shows how many people are in disagreement, and it has splintered the country. A vast consensus of people would have given support cheerfully had the Constitution been patriated with an amending formula only, and without the complications of this imperfect Charter of Rights.

[Senator Molson.]

Honourable senators, I began my remarks by saying that one of my objections to the resolution was the fact that my province, Quebec, was not involved. Senator Roblin's amendment providing compensation for opting out should remove some of Quebec's principal objections, so I support it, knowing that it will not change Quebec's attitude. I also support Senator Tremblay's amendment, ensuring that Quebec has equal freedom of decision with the other provinces who have signed. This amendment has become doubly important since last weekend when the Parti Québécois convention drew the party to independence without association, facing the premier with a very difficult decision. I am reminded of the Biblical expression:

They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind.

We must make every effort to give strength, even though our actions will not affect the result, to the moderate elements in Quebec and do nothing to favour those like the FLQ, who now seem to have a strong voice in the party.

I also make clear that I cannot accept the position in which Quebec's anglophones will find themselves. Although it would correct only one small injustice, an amendment should have been included guaranteeing the children of anglophone families who attend French schools the right to send their children in the future to English schools. As it now stands, the grandchildren of English families whose children attend French schools, in an effort to create closer ties and better understanding, lose their rights. All Canadians, French, English, ethnic and aboriginal, equally should be protected by a charter, but this Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not assure that protection. It seems to protect some at the expense of others. There must be equality and justice for all of our citizens if the Charter is not to be a sham.

Honourable senators, it may be that I spent too much time on the problems of the anglophone minority of Quebec, but we are discussing a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is extremely difficult at this moment, perhaps an historical moment, to represent the Province of Quebec in the Senate. It is particularly difficult to represent the minorities of Quebec at this moment. On one hand we preach the freedom of the individual, and on the other we see the process of suppression of the use of our own native language. How do we reconcile these?

We find now, honourable senators, that my province refuses to accept the resolution. We also have to accept the fact that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not protect the rights and freedoms of the Quebec minorities. As one of their representatives, I have no choice but to vote against the resolution.

Senator Godfrey: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Molson: Yes.

Senator Flynn: Come on.

Senator Walker: Sit down.

Senator Godfrey: The honourable senator said that Senator Roblin's amendment would not satisfy Quebec. Did he mean that it would not satisfy the Quebec government or the Province of Quebec?

Senator Molson: I obviously meant the Quebec government because, as I mentioned earlier, I do not think the government and the population of the province are completely in accord.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I wish to start by congratulating all the previous speakers both on the quality of their speeches and their laudable efforts to keep this debate at the highest possible level, which is appropriate in a chamber said to be the chamber of sober, second thought.

I should like to follow their example, although I shall not be sharing the views of most of my colleagues, and I shall explain to the best of my ability the reasons for my position.

Since last spring, a number of important events have taken place in connection with the Constitution; at the end of the last conference, the result I was most afraid of finally materialized, namely, an agreement among nine provinces and the isolation of Quebec.

Since then in my province parliamentary debate has been submerged under purely political debate, which has created a particularly difficult situation for me as a senator from Quebec.

Like all Quebecers today, I feel trapped between the federalist and the indépendantiste factions. The political debate in my province is already heated in the extreme, and in this context, federalists who are opposed to the draft resolution risk either being identified as indépendantistes or at the very least being accused of furthering the ultimate aims of the Parti Québécois. I am quite aware of this danger. I am counting on your intellectual maturity to make the necessary distinctions.

I want to state right away that I am one of many Quebec federalists who voted no in the referendum, in the expectation that after the referendum, they would see a plan for renewed federalism quite different from the one being proposed in the draft constitutional resolution. The draft resolution is proposing a new concept of Canadian federalism. It is proposing a set of individual rights, as opposed to the collective rights we have exercised as our sovereign right since 1867. This new philosophy acknowledges implicitly that Quebec is a province like the other provinces, and that the values that are a consequence of our specific cultural character are not different from other values.

In the field of education, for instance, under the present Constitution, the National Assembly has exclusive and sovereign control, and I shall always maintain that this right is not only essential to our future development, but also that, if we give even one inch on this issue, we shall be close to creating a dangerous precedent.

This is not the only objection I have to the draft, but even if it were the only one, it would be sufficient reason for me to vote against the resolution.

You will recall that before the opening of the federal-provincial conference, all provinces had agreed about the patriation of the Constitution, with the amending formula known as the "Vancouver" formula, including an opting-out clause with financial compensation. This was a tremendous success for the federal government. We would not have our present problems if the government had not taken advantage of patriation to include a Charter of Rights which, according to the Supreme Court, affects the exclusive rights hitherto exercised by the provinces.

I must say that in Quebec, the vast majority of the people agree with patriating the Constitution with an amending formula which would guarantee full compensation in case of opting out, and a charter of rights which would not reduce our legislative jurisdictions. This also was progress because, in the past all former premiers had objected to patriation until the principle of the sharing of powers was discussed and accepted.

• (1650)

Here is an interesting point which I would like to make. If I were to ask the following question: Why is it that no Quebec premier, since Sir Lomer Gouin's days, has ever promoted or suggested this patriation which was, in fact, to break off the last colonial tie? The answer would be that to preserve their present rights, the people of Quebec felt more secure with the 1867 Constitution, which is being kept in a case in the London Tower, than they would be if it were placed in the hands of our Canadian politicians. That is a very strange historical fact, but the fear of our former Quebec premiers is being confirmed by current events.

Honourable senators, there is one aspect of the recent federal-provincial conference that I would like to emphasize for the sake of a better understanding of the results of that conference. Before attending, the Quebec premier had been given a very precise mandate by the National Assembly on September 30, following a resolution which had been amended by the Leader of the Opposition, Claude Ryan, and later on adopted by both parties in the National Assembly with 111 ayes and 9 nays. This resolution should be taken into account. It reads as follows:

The Supreme Court of Canada having ruled that the federal proposal relative to the Constitution of Canada reduces the powers of the Quebec Assembly and that this unilateral action on the part of the federal government, although legal is unconstitutional because it goes against the conventions, this Assembly demands that the federal government forgo its unilateral request, opposes any action which could impinge upon its rights and affect its powers without its consent and asks that the federal and provincial governments resume negotiations immediately in accordance with the principles and conventions which must govern any amendment to the Canadian federal system.

This was a clear and specific mandate given by the National Assembly, and the key phrase in the text which I have just read is the following:

This Assembly opposes any action which could impinge upon its rights and affect its powers without its consent.

During his speech on this resolution, the Liberal leader, Mr. Claude Ryan, said the following:

That the federal government was not supposed to make any constitutional change which would affect the powers of the provinces without first having obtained their consent is something that we had always taken for granted: I have myself asserted this for 25 years—

This is Mr. Ryan talking:

—I was certain that I was abiding by the most orthodox and the most permanent of doctrines.

On page 21 of his speech, Mr. Ryan added:

It is this whole idea of our country, of its future and of the balance between the two levels of government which underlies the debate that has been dividing us deeply and tearing us apart for months. This idea of a supreme federal state within the Canadian Federation is not one which the Liberal party of Quebec supports.

As a non-elected member of this Canadian Parliament who has been appointed to this Upper Chamber to fulfill the constitutional mandate of representing my region and my province, I feel in all conscience the moral obligation to respect this resolution voted by the National Assembly.

Honourable senators, like yourselves, I followed the most recent federal-provincial conference on television and I was bewildered when the results were announced. One of these days we shall probably learn what happened, especially as concerns the negotiations held during the last night. I have asked myself many questions, including this one: What was the major reason for the break-up in the common front of the eight dissident provinces which had been in agreement for over a year and why is it that this agreement between the eight ended up so abruptly?

I have heard one explanation in this regard, that of the Quebec Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs. In my opinion, it is interesting and I thought it would be appropriate to quote from it for the information of this chamber.

The seven dissident anglophone provinces suddenly realized that if this so-called last chance conference were to fail, the government's constitutional resolution might be rejected by the British Parliament because of a lack of consensus, and I believe that if this had happened and if this resolution had been agreed to by just two provinces as was the case in the beginning, the prestige and the credibility of our country itself would have suffered. This is a plausible explanation, and I thought that you might be interested in hearing about it.

The ties which held Quebec to the seven other dissenting provinces were not only fragile but once again the values conveyed by those ties were entirely different, mostly cultural on one hand and economic on the other. The agreement between the nine provinces which made that project legitimate according to the Supreme Court, however, left my province in an utter legal confusion as to the existence of a veto right to thwart that project since it had not signed the agreement, or of a veto right with complete financial compensation in the case where it would opt out of a program following patriation.

Last week, both first ministers, the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Lévesque had a quite revealing correspondence in that connection. Does Quebec have a veto right under these circumstances and if so, did it forgo this right during the negotiations? In view of the issues at stake, especially those concerning my province, I think that it would be advisable to take legal action so that in the last resort, the Supreme Court of Canada will clarify that legal aspect which it had not been specifically called upon to consider. The essential point that is being raised is whether Quebec has a veto right which, according to tradition would prevent the Canadian Parliament and other legislatures from amending the Constitution without its consent.

I have another valid reason to believe that Quebec will take advantage of that last legal resort; for about two years, there could be a moratorium on the constitutional debate which would not prevent of course that resolution from being introduced as legislation. This would not only enable us to catch a second breath, but all the governments could give the priority to urgent economic problems.

Honourable senators, before concluding, there are three aspects on which I would like to comment briefly; first, Ontario's refusal to be subjected to section 133 of the Constitution, that is institutionalized bilingualism in the legislature and before the courts.

I mention in passing the generous gesture of the New Brunswick premier in this respect; nobody has explained yet why the linguistic minority in Ontario should not be granted the same rights as the linguistic minority in Quebec. The letter which Premier Davis of Ontario wrote to an Ottawa woman and which appeared in the daily La Presse of November 23 sheds a revealing light on this matter, and I can assure you that this is an aspect of the constitutional proposal which has been very painfully felt in my province.

• (1700)

I do not agree with section 46 dealing with the suspensive veto of the Senate on constitutional matters for two reasons: First, why should this suspensive veto on economic matters not apply instead to constitutional matters? Second, if the government proposes to have a provincial representation when it reforms the Senate, it would be all the more reason for not depriving these representatives of a full veto right so that they may properly safeguard the rights of their respective provinces. I admit that I do not quite understand the purpose of section 46, and before we are called upon to vote on the proposed amendment, I hope we will be enlightened on this aspect of the Senate's present and future powers.

I must regretfully advise Senator Sullivan, a colleague I hold in high esteem, that I could not accept his amendment on abortion. I will explain briefly why. I have always felt that whenever the conscience of an individual is involved, the higher principle of the freedom of choice must come into play, and I think that in this case, the woman concerned must be the only judge and assume alone full responsibility for her decision under these circumstances; moreover, I should add that whatever her decision may be, our society should provide her with the best possible care.

However, I want to commend Senator Sullivan for raising in the Senate this issue which is one of the most controversial questions in our society. I regret that it should be raised along with so many other aspects of the resolution, and I certainly hope that some day we will be called upon to vote on the abortion issue. We should not be afraid to make our position known on that issue, and I feel that the Senate should have more opportunities to express its views on similar issues in order to give proper guidance to public opinion.

Honourable senators, I conclude this overly long speech with the following comments.

The great legal debate ended with the Supreme Court of Canada ruling and, in a few hours, tomorrow afternoon around 5 o'clock, this parliamentary debate will end in the Senate. However, because Quebec is not party to this agreement, we cannot now avoid in the province a basic political debate, which has already begun in any event. Still, I am not pessimistic. The political forces which fashion the destiny of nations are very unpredictable indeed. We should not dramatize anything, but hope instead that with the passage of time and the ingenuity of politicians special concessions will be made to Quebec. That will be the high price to pay to secure the agreement of my province and thus give Canada a second start towards well understood national unity.

Indeed, those unpredictable political forces I mentioned a moment ago are already working. The Minister of State, Mr. Serge Joyal, announced these past few days that amendments are not acceptable at this late hour. I regret that, because it is not very interesting for us here who have the power not only to move amendments but also to adopt them. I did not like that statement. But just the same, the minister said in his statement that we are now going through the first stage and that there would be others. Unless I am mistaken, I interpreted those words to mean that the door is not closed forever once this resolution becomes law.

The Progressive Conservative Party has shown much flexibility about linguistic rights and financial compensation in cases of opting out. Even the ineffable Mr. Broadbent, the leader of the New Democratic Party, who endorsed this resolution when only two provinces supported it, is already beginning to talk about special status for Quebec.

The Leader of the Quebec Liberal Party, Mr. Claude Ryan, has submitted on behalf of his party formulas for compromise which sound quite reasonable and would apparently be fairly easy to incorporate in this proposed resolution.

It can be expected that in the near future no political party in Canada will be able to go through a not only those convention without avoiding a review of the agreement of the ten first ministers so as to draw Quebec into the fold.

Once this Charter comes back from London in the form of legislation, it will be the duty of all of us to find a formula to protect Quebec's vested interests within the limits of the new Constitution of 1981.

For the time being, let us wait until the dust settles. Compromises which seemed impossible to us a few days ago will appear quite natural on reflection and with time, because the constitutional evolution of a country does take a long time and cannot happen in haste and through brute force. Even though my province is isolated today, I still say that nothing is lost. In fact, and I conclude with these words, in a strange paradox, I believe that in its temporary isolation the province of Quebec seems to me today to have a brighter constitutional future than when it was linked with the seven dissenting provinces by artificial ties.

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I rise here today to add very few words to this debate—very few because I think that all that could possibly be said on this constitutional issue has long since been said. Some of the speeches that have been made on this matter have been among the best reasoned and best delivered that I have ever been privileged to hear. I think now, particularly, of the intervention of the Honourable Senator Manning a few evenings ago which, in my opinion, is a classic and really should be given a great deal more thought and attention.

I remark at my own temerity in rising after the two esteemed senior senators from the province of Quebec who spoke of that province from two different angles. I respect the opinions of both of them very much, and they have my deepest sympathy. All three gentlemen pointed to the dangers inherent in going forward with this resolution without the participation of Quebec. Perhaps most of my few words this afternoon will be directed along that same line.

Honourable senators, I fully realize that most Canadians were very happy indeed when an agreement was reached in Ottawa just a few weeks ago. I fully admit that I was one of them. I did not share the full euphoria that many of my fellow citizens did, as I knew that the document was imperfect in many ways, but it was a Constitution for all Canadians, or so I thought at the time. I never dreamed for a moment, honourable senators, that this country of ours would contemplate a Constitution that did not have the endorsement of the people of Quebec. I am not so naive as to think that the first ministers could have pleased Mr. Lévesque, let alone his Parti Québécois supporters. If Premier Lévesque had signed the Accord, it would have had the effect of having the PQ Party endorse federalism, and, surely, that is not compatible with the announced and very obvious objectives of the PQ Party.

Honourable senators, pleasing or co-operating with the Lévesque government is one thing, and perhaps a very difficult thing, but it is certainly not the important thing in this context. To send to the United Kingdom Parliament this package which would, in effect, take from the Province of Quebec powers and privileges which that province had prior to the recent Accord between the Government of Canada and the other nine provinces, is unthinkable. I do not care a hoot how Mr. Lévesque and the separatists feel about the Accord—my understanding is that they do not want to be part of Canada anyway—but I do care very much how Mr. Ryan and the federalists feel about this matter. My understanding is that they are just as upset as the Government of Quebec. It is probably true to say that the federalists in Quebec are angrier than the PQ, because what we are doing here is providing the separatists with more ammunition to further their cause. We are telling the federalists that we are not to be trusted, and we do not care, in effect, what they do. We are signifying to the majority of Quebecers who voted “no” in the referendum that we, in the other regions of Canada, do not care.

Honourable senators, this matter has to be one of the supreme cynical ironies of all time. This constitutional debate, which was launched on the pretext of satisfying the aspirations of our francophone citizens in a renewed federalist Canada—this grinding, divisive debate now nears its end with our francophone citizens more alienated than ever before. Not only the PQ supporters, but—from what we can gather from a poll taken a few days ago in Quebec, from what we can gather from recent events in the Quebec legislature, from what we hear from honourable senators from Quebec, from what we hear from French-speaking people on the Hill, especially the younger ones, and in fact from all sources in the province of Quebec—the majority of French-speaking Canadians are very dissatisfied with this document, as, indeed, they should be.

This should concern all of us. It should concern us at least enough to make an offer to these people. Let us, at least, offer these people what they were entitled to before the Accord. Let us include a satisfactory compensation clause. Let us offer them satisfactory language rights, as we have to other provinces. I have heard people—honourable senators and others—say, “What for? Mr. Lévesque does not want an agreement. You can offer him everything, but he will find a reason to turn it down.” The people who say this could very well be right. In fact, I am sure these people are right. But, surely, that is not the point. We in this place should be trying, in my opinion, to encourage the federalists in Quebec. If we make the gesture and the PQ turn it down, we will at least have kept faith with those Quebecers who voted for Canada in the referendum.

If we do not make this gesture and if we do not say to these people, “Stand firm. We in Canada want you in Confederation. You are an essential part of this country,” then we are making a difficult situation in Quebec a great deal more difficult.

We all know, or should know, how important the Province of Quebec has held the opting-out principle to be. If they do not feel they wish to participate in a program, then they may take the cash value of that program. This is important and intrinsic protection of the cultural, educational and other rights and programs of the people of Quebec.

[Senator Doody.]

The amendment moved and so well-explained by Senator Roblin really bestows nothing new. It is a good principle and one consistent with Canadian federalism.

Honourable senators, my understanding of the agreement between the federal government and the nine provinces is that the federal government was given a fairly free hand to deal with, and to reach an Accord with, the province that had not signed. The line that has been used as an excuse for not offering concessions to that province is, in brief, that we cannot change the Accord, or the assenting provinces—the other nine provinces who had signed—would back off. Surely this argument cannot be sustained. Change was made, and properly so, to accommodate the concerns of the women of Canada. Change was made to at least partially accommodate our native people—not enough, perhaps, but change was made. Surely, honourable senators, some change could be made to sustain and to accommodate the millions of federalists in Quebec.

We, in my own province of Newfoundland, had some very serious problems with the original package which was discussed here, in the other place and in committee. There were serious reservations and sincere worries. For instance, there was the danger of a change in the right to denominational education, and a danger, however remote, of unilateral boundary changes. There was a great deal of discussion about the mobility clause. These problems were recognized, honourable senators, and solutions were found. To that extent, at least, these concerns of my province were put to rest, although not all of the concerns of Newfoundland were put to rest. Talks are still going on regarding offshore resource matters, and I fervently hope that a mutually beneficial solution will be found to that problem.

Honourable senators, I hope that some meaningful input into fishery policy, involving stock management, quota allocation, licensing and marketing—indeed, all areas of fishery policy; not those of jurisdiction or ownership, or any such foolishness, but meaningful input into this most vital of all economic, social and cultural matters; indeed, the very reason for Newfoundland's existence—will be settled by people of goodwill working together.

● (1720)

It was that same good will, honourable senators, that enabled Newfoundland to accept, with full enthusiasm, the Charter of Rights, and it did not demand, as the price of its acceptance, either fish or oil for those rights, despite the cynical sneer to that effect at the time. The sneer was proved to be wrong and the premier of my province, Premier Peckford, played no small part in making possible the final consensus; and I feel that I would be remiss if I did not, at this time, mention his role in reaching the Accord.

But many areas are not addressed in the document, including the vital issue of the right to life. Senator Macdonald spoke so well to the motion in amendment this afternoon that I will not expand on this crucial moral issue at this time, except to endorse the words and sentiments expressed by Senator Macdonald and by the mover, Senator Sullivan.

There are many other areas open to argument, and they will take years to work their way through the courts. I know that the legal profession in Canada need never worry again, as it now has at hand, in the shape of this document, a permanent make-work plan.

It has been said, and it will be said, that not everyone is happy. All the provinces, not only my own, had major problems to deal with, major concerns of their own, and by and large most—not all, but most—of their concerns were met. Much was done to meet their objections.

Why, then, can we not, in the name of Canada, make some concessions to meet the concerns of the people of Quebec—not the PQ, but our fellow Canadians in Quebec? Surely, the gesture suggested by Senator Flynn—the postponement or adjournment of this debate until December 14—would have been a small way of telling our friends in Quebec that we in the Senate are aware of their problems and are trying to help them in their fight to remain an important part of Canada.

Let me be quite honest in the matter, honourable senators. My concern is not only for the Province of Quebec, real and great though that fear is, and it is not only for the survival of Canada, as we know it, great and real as that fear might be; but I have a real dread of what will become of Atlantic Canada, particularly Newfoundland, if René Lévesque and his supporters get their way. Therefore, honourable senators, any help that the separatists get in furthering their objective—removing Quebec from Canada—has to be resisted in every way that we can; and make no mistake, if we pass this resolution without consideration of the concerns of the people of Quebec, we are surely helping the separatist cause.

So we come to the crux of the problem. As I have explained, the immediate problems which faced us in the other provinces have been corrected and other problems are being discussed. The property rights clause, which has been of concern to many people, has been omitted, at least partially, to facilitate the concerns of that tiny but splendidly beautiful province of Prince Edward Island. Protection of its farmland and its beaches from absentee landlords is essential to its very existence. But the accommodation was made, and there is no property rights clause. The amendments on linguistic rights, put forward by Senator Tremblay, and on compensation, by Senator Roblin, are not nearly as repugnant to Canadians as the accommodation made for Ontario on French language use, or on property rights which I have just mentioned, or on, say, the labour mobility rights inserted to satisfy my own province.

As I and others have noted, we have already made amendments to satisfy women's demands and aboriginal demands. Why, then, in the name of support for Quebec federalists, can we not at least extend the very reasonable and basic accommodations that are embodied in the amendments put forward by our two colleagues, Senators Tremblay and Roblin? If, after that, Premier Lévesque and his government still do not come on board, they will be exposed for the non-Canadians they are, and the real Canadians in Quebec will know that they have some supporters, at least, in the rest of Canada.

At first, as I said at the beginning of my speech, I was happy to see the end of the matter, and, like my friend and seat-mate, Senator Cook, since the most immediate of Newfoundland's problems had been resolved, I was prepared to let the thing go. But much as I respect my friend, and as many times as I have congratulated him for his courageous stand on behalf of our province, on this occasion I fear I cannot join him in supporting this resolution—for, to support the resolution as it stands, without amendment, would be a tragic mistake—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody:—and no service to Canada or to its many parts.

So, honourable senators, we draw close to the end of the debate. The time for the vote has been set, and the government majority will see it passed as we received it from the other place. The Leader of the Government in the Senate has stated that it will not be changed because the other partners to the Accord, the nine provinces, do not want it changed. They, the provinces, will disallow the agreement, it is said, if change is made. But, surely, honourable senators, that cannot be factual. Changes have been made, and I wonder whether it is not possible, even at this late stage, if it has not already been done, to contact Premier Bennett of British Columbia, the provincial premiers' chairman, and to ask him—and, through him the other premiers—whether they will consider our amendments to the resolution; and if Premier Bennett and the other premiers refuse to accept them, then so be it. Let the responsibility be theirs and not the responsibility of the Senate of Canada.

I wonder whether those premiers have already been asked to accept the compensation clause, or the linguistic rights clause. I doubt it very much; but if they have been asked and have refused, then I believe that the correspondence should be tabled.

Honourable senators, the few days' delay requested by Senator Flynn would perhaps have given us more time to follow that line of reasoning, and more time perhaps to have seen that the premiers were contacted on this matter. Surely, there is not much time before December 14, but time that I suspect we will be only too anxious to give to this vital matter in the months and years to come. I believe that a great deal more time than these few days will be spent by all of us in trying to correct the tragic mistake that we may be making here tomorrow.

There may be some tragic consequences flow from the decision already taken by the government majority in the Senate. I hope I am wrong—I deeply hope that I am wrong; but the real possibility exists that we are paving the way for serious trouble in the very near future.

I speak not only of the fears of our native people; or the mistrust and unease and legitimate concern that have been set afloat in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, in the case that was so ably presented by Senator Macquarrie; or of the rights of the unborn, so passionately presented by Senator

Sullivan; or the clause that imperils the Senate itself, as explained by Senator Walker—although I must add that if we continue to be as subservient to the Commons as we appear to be on this particular issue, then I believe we have little to worry about; but I speak also of the fears of the federalists in Quebec, who feel, with justification, that they have been deserted and betrayed—by cruel coincidence, at the very hour of the separatist PQ convention, a convention so radical in its nationalistic fervour as to make René Lévesque himself sound at times like a moderate.

We, the members of the Senate on both sides, have a unique opportunity to demonstrate to the people of Canada, particularly to the people of Quebec, that the upper chamber of the Parliament of Canada has an essential role to play in the law-making process. We are not bound by agreements or accords, no matter how spurious have been the arguments on those accords and agreements during the past few days. We are bound only by the mandate set forth in the document legitimizing the Senate of Canada.

Honourable senators, if ever there was a time to truly represent the provinces and the regions of Canada, surely this must be it. Amend the resolution or delay it, we must demonstrate to the people of Quebec, and to the rest of Canada, that we serve a useful purpose here. We must demonstrate to the people of Quebec that we recognize the problem facing the federalists in that province. If we do not, then I fear that the whole of Canada will be the loser. The fact that most of the problems in the provinces have been resolved in the resolution now before us is really a short-term and narrow victory if we do not have the good will of the people of Quebec; for if ever a province could be said to be an essential part of this country, then surely that province must be Quebec.

Honourable senators, John Donne said it many years ago far better than I could. I will not quote in its entirety what he said but enough to make us think about it:

No man is an Island, entire of it self.

This country will be the loser if Quebec disappears.

● (1730)

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, the flag of my province may have flown at half mast, but, also in my province, the flag of my country is now raised to its full glory by all Canadians of Quebec. It has been some time since the Maple Leaf has been allowed to fly over government buildings in Quebec, and this situation may continue for a short while longer.

I promise, honourable senators, not to restate any of my historical premises, but my plea is for a unanimous vote from the Senate of Canada for the resolution now before us. I say "unanimous", because all members of Parliament in the House of Commons and the Senate, who worked night after night on the clause-by-clause hearings, voted in favour of its adoption. Should less be expected from this house, whose credo must always be "on balance"?

I say "unanimous" also because of 24 dissenters only three were from my Quebec. The 72 who voted in favour deserve our support, for they, as responsible elected representatives, included their constituents in this great "happening".

Perhaps if we analyzed the motives of the 24 opposing members, we would find some moot points to which we could relate and even agree to, but, honourable senators, is it not time for the "end of the beginning"?

Lest we repeat the historical and political processes that culminated in this resolution now before us, let us simply say that the nearest thing to impossibility has been achieved with this Accord between the Government of Canada and nine of the provinces.

In my view, it was wrong for the provincial governments to hold rogatory meetings in London. It was wrong also to use Quebec the way they did. The word "deception" may best describe their actions, for they knew that the Government of Quebec was gambling on a complete break-up of the federal government. They all lost to the will of the people of Canada, as well as to the outstanding leadership of the Government of Canada, a team dedicated to nation building.

How many of us could have kept pace in the face of such incredible power plays? But again, the will of the nation deserves the greatest of tributes. Duplicity took a back seat.

Of the three dissenting members of Parliament from Quebec, we must of course write one off. His position in the referendum virtually makes it impossible for him to opt in. But with regard to the other two, there is an irony. One opposed because it did not go far enough towards protecting French-speaking interests, while the other dissented because it did not go far enough to protect the rights of English-speaking people in their pursuits of earning a living and raising a family in their own official language. Neither view is valid, as both linguistic interests, which should have been protected under section 133 of the British North America Act, were subverted by violations of both the letter and the spirit of that act. However, I see nothing but futility in the imposing of anything whatsoever by one level of government on another, especially when one of the governments will have no part of this proclamation. Needless to say the community in Montreal will be in turmoil for some time to come.

They are the real and only losers in this ploy of the Parti Québécois government, and this includes the French-speaking community that they pretend to elevate.

One would assume that if a language was official in a legislature, it would also be valid and official in the marketplace and in social life. That is the spirit of the law as it was intended by the Fathers of Confederation.

I agree with Senator Rizzuto when he states that if Senator Tremblay's amendments were to be accepted, and with Quebec having authority over the educational rights of Quebecers, "the rights of the English-speaking Quebecers would not be guaranteed if ever the Quebec government were to prevent them from attending English schools? There would be no one then to ensure that their rights are secured."

Therefore, I cannot agree with the amendment. I must protect minorities, be they francophones outside Quebec, or anglophones within Quebec. Personally, I am opposed to section 23(1)(a) not being imposed at this time.

This resolution before us, with its Charter of Rights, could re-instill the spirit of the B.N.A. Act as originally intended, and could assist the citizens of this country with the protection of their inherent and native rights before the courts.

In the meantime, it disappoints me when I see deals and trickery in connection with restrictions on the language of education. Why are we so terrorized by language of instruction? Is it perchance because each language has a different history attached to it? If so, this is a very fragile way to develop a national raison d'être. Honourable senators, parents see a destiny for their children. Let them fulfil it, for it is they who should be calling the shots.

Perhaps, in time, Bill 63 of the late Premier Bertrand will be re-enacted giving parents the right and freedom to choose a destiny for their children and that, honourable senators, is my hope for the future. Perhaps aberrations like Bill 22 will be impossible under the Charter, and monstrosities like Bill 101, which militates directly against the political, social and economic life of both halves of the Montreal population, will just be a costly memory of the past.

Perhaps the poisoned political climate of Quebec is seeing its worst days, and perhaps we can restore dignity to our community; otherwise, what is the purpose of a Charter of Rights? Let us at least try it, for who knows what the alternative could be?

Let me remind those opposing the resolution out of respect for the Quebec government's obstruction, that there are a million English-speaking Canadians in Quebec who are an embarrassment to the present provincial government, as they do not fit its projected profiles. Consequently, there was no way that the Parti Québécois government could have entered into the Accord without including these people as citizens, and the impossibility they face here is that these million, plus some two million of their French-speaking co-citizens, will always thwart the attempts of the Quebec separatists.

Let us also support and vote for this majority, and let us, honourable senators, be in the forefront of this giant step of the people of Canada toward their complete self-fulfilment. In voting for this resolution, I am primarily voting for my fellow Quebecers, so that they may maintain their ownership of all and every part of Canada. I beg my fellow senators to join me and make it unanimous.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.10 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Molgat, who is acting deputy leader, mentioned this afternoon that he might wish to ask leave to revert to Notices of Motions in order to make a motion regarding the sitting tomorrow morning. Pursuant to the agreement of the Senate that we would be able to do so, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hayden, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g),

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, 8th December, 1981, at 10.30 in the forenoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have no objection to the motion. I also have no objection to sitting without interruption until whatever time is decided upon, which could even be after the vote tomorrow afternoon, which is, by order of the Senate, to be taken at 5 o'clock. Will there be an interruption for lunch or should we bypass that?

Senator Frith: I think we should decide that on the basis of the number of senators who have yet to speak and who wish to do so. I expect, however, if it seems we can accommodate all senators, that we could break at 12.30 p.m. and come back at 2 o'clock. I think we should remember that we will want to leave the Leader of the Opposition enough time for his speech on the resolution and on any of the amendments, followed by a wrap-up by the Leader of the Government. I suggest that we think in terms of the Leader of the Opposition being given the opportunity to speak tomorrow afternoon no later than 3.15.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, may I ask a question? Should we have more speakers in line than we expected, has Senator Frith given some thought to extending the hours tonight in order to accommodate them?

Senator Frith: Did you say extended hours tonight?

Senator Deschatelets: Yes, so that we can accommodate all senators.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn and I have discussed that and we decided to see where we stand later this evening. We should sit, in principle, until approximately 10 o'clock and at that time see if there are others who really wish to speak tonight. If so, we could sit extended hours in order to accommodate them, bearing in mind what I have just said about the fact that we will have at least two hours tomorrow, since we are resuming the sitting at 10.30 a.m.

Senator Flynn: We should keep in mind, too, that there is no time for an adjournment specified under our rules. Therefore, as has been done, we could sit until midnight or even 1 o'clock if you do not force us to adjourn.

Senator Frith: I should say, though we are not looking for a Senate order in this regard, that if we are going to observe the order as to voting at 5 o'clock, in addition to Senator Flynn being given the opportunity to speak no later than 3.15, we could give Senator Perrault at least half an hour to finish, since he has already spoken and Senator Flynn has not.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN— DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, last week, after a minor accident, I was urged to rest for a few days until I was feeling better. Since an historic debate was taking place in the Senate and the future of my country was at stake, as a Quebecer, I could not stay home and had to come here to deliver my message. I believe it reflects the feelings of most Quebecers who are sad and have become rebellious and, in some cases, aggressive and insular. Some Quebecers will argue that it is no use trusting our English-speaking compatriots any longer and that perhaps we should become the masters of our own destiny and run our own affairs.

Yes, honourable senators, the truth is not very palatable. Quebecers are disappointed in the way the constitutional negotiations turned out. They really have the impression that English Canada, through the provincial premiers, have decided the keep Quebec out of this historic agreement.

All this despite the promises made during the referendum campaign held in Quebec last year, when federal politicians and politicians from other provinces came to meet Quebecers and promised them that if Quebec voted no on the referendum question, there would be thorough changes in the Constitution and that Quebec itself would have a place in this constitutional change, in this new Canadian federation.

We shall long hear the echoes of that solemn statement made by the Prime Minister of Canada when, speaking to his compatriots in Quebec, he said: "We are playing all or nothing. As soon as you vote no in the Quebec referendum, we guarantee that we will change the status quo and that Quebec will have its place with the other provinces in this new Constitution, this new Canadian federation."

Yes, honourable senators, the people of Quebec are wondering about what happened at the constitutional conference in November and particularly that night when it was decided, without the participation of Quebec, to give Canada a new Constitution that accommodated, I repeat, accommodated, the English-speaking majority in Canada.

If we are to believe Mr. Lévesque's version of what happened, and it has not been contradicted by the other provincial premiers to date, it seems that the federal government and the English-speaking provinces wanted to reach an agreement at any price, notwithstanding commitments to Quebec made by the premiers of the English-speaking provinces last April.

Following the Constitutional Conference, Quebecers are wondering about the unilateral character of this decision. People do not think the agreement signed by the federal government and the English-speaking provinces alters the unilateral aspect of this constitutional decision.

As for myself, speaking as a Quebecer who for a long time has agreed with the concept that Quebec has a very specific character and position within Canada, I doubt personally that this agreement represents the substantial consensus mentioned in the Supreme Court's decision, to the extent that it would make the constitutional resolution both legal and conventional.

On the contrary, I maintain that the resolution in its present form is grist to the mill of the separatists and is breaking down our remaining arguments in favour of Canadian unity. This view, honourable senators, is taken by all the members of the National Assembly in Quebec, and is therefore of considerable concern to a large part of public opinion in Quebec. To prove my point, one need only read the editorial pages in our newspapers and find out what the media are saying, to conclude that francophones are agreed on the following point: that by doing what they did, the anglophones have categorically rejected the basic concept of Canadian duality, and that by doing so, they have ignored the views of 26 per cent of the Canadian population. Some will still contend that a country can be built, that it can be renewed even if its people are divided.

Honourable senators, in the next few minutes I shall attempt to go over with you the deep-rooted reasons which are responsible for this extremely alarming situation.

First, the federal government approach to bring Quebec into the Accord has been I think all wrong. The hard line taken by the Quebec government has led us to a deadlock. Of course we have to deal with the legitimate Quebec government because it has democratically been elected by the people of Quebec. But beyond that government there was the Quebec people and there is still the Quebec people.

Governments go but societies remain. I think that keeping in mind the people of Quebec, as some senators have suggested here ever since the beginning of this debate, we should have conceded on some points which the Quebec people would have liked. They would have forced the Quebec government in power to accept a proposal they considered reasonable, had the facts been presented to them in the proper way. We could have agreed that the dual status of the Canadian people was something we could easily recognize. It could have been stated in a constitutional preamble which could have been written following repatriation of the Canadian Constitution.

The most important issue is the financial compensation, which was raised by my colleague Senator Roblin. It would have been easy to say that cultural and educational matters set aside, we would grant full financial compensation not only to Quebec as the New Democratic Party wanted it, but also to every province in order to avoid blatant economic injustice as was the case during the last few years when Quebec refused to join in the joint programs. We could, of course, have accepted, as was suggested by Senator Tremblay, an opting-out clause to clauses 23 and 58, and in this way Quebec would have kept jurisdiction over an area which is of major and dear importance to them namely in the field of education and culture.

● (2020)

As was mentioned this afternoon, honourable senators, this was done for women and the natives. Why not for Quebec? As I said before it would have forced the people of Quebec to tell their government that it was enough and they wanted it to accept the reasonable proposal put forward by the federal government. Why also was the veto right of Quebec done away with offhandedly? When Mr. Lesage was in power in 1964, he used it unequivocally and nobody said it was illegal, merely conventional, and he was respected for doing so. When Mr. Bourassa used his veto right in 1971, the federal government accepted it. Why? Why was it argued offhandedly that the Supreme Court had decided that Quebec did not have a veto right? Honourable senators, as stated by my dear friend, Senator Flynn, in an interview given to a newspaperman from Le Soleil, we have witnessed during the constitutional debate, a cockfight, a struggle to the bitter end between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Quebec premier. Our people will pay for this.

It will not be the governments in power but the people of Quebec who will have to pay for its isolation. Yes, Quebecers are sad and are mourning because they feel that their cause was poorly championed by their representatives in Ottawa. Quebecers feel that their members and some of their ministers in Ottawa have failed them. The Quebec ministers too often take an aggressive, provocative and even insulting attitude towards the Quebec government and indirectly towards Quebecers.

This is why La Presse denounced the cocky attitude of some ministers such as Mr. Chrétien, as reported in the paper on November 31, 1981, and I quote:

It would seem that Mr. Chrétien who is probably very nice with the rest of the world takes a great deal of pleasure in ruthing Quebec the wrong way. He showed it again on Thursday when he merely laughed at the mention of the order in council the Quebec cabinet had just passed to promulgate the veto right of Quebec in constitutional matters. One cannot claim that one sincerely wishes to reach an agreement with Quebec while trying at every opportunity to make its representatives look ridiculous.

During this debate, Mr. Chrétien did not hesitate on a number of occasions to ridicule the positions held by certain Quebec ministers during the debate. And my friend, Mr. Pierre De Bané, whose attitude has tremendously changed since he became a minister, he had me greatly surprised last week when speaking before the House, he displayed such sarcasm against the nationalist attitude of the Quebec representatives during those constitutional discussions.

However, I would like to refresh the memory of my friend Mr. De Bané, with whom I signed a minority report in 1972 as a member of the Joint Senate and House of Commons Committee on the Constitution. After consultations, we had come to the conclusion that in the majority report submitted to the House of Commons and the Senate a most important chapter was lacking. A place had not been found for Quebec in that constitutional package, that new Canadian package. We told ourselves that we would write a minority report as Senator Molgat, who was vice-chairman of that committee, surely remembers very well, and we made recommendations to the committee. I am very much surprised today to realize that Mr. De Bané has forgotten those recommendations he made at that time. I would like to remind him that the first recommendation was:

That the preamble to the Constitution, in addition to what it should normally include, recognize explicitly the existence and aspirations of the Quebec society.

And in the second recommendation, we stated:

It is essentially in our view that the body of the Constitution recognize to Quebec's society, therefore to Quebec, a basic right to self-determination.

Those who have an opportunity to read that document will see for themselves the predictions we made at that time. We even indicated there was a possibility of a separatist or independantiste government being elected in Quebec, and these objectives might have to be respected rather than bought by means of an economic and financial blackmail and the army's intervention.

Another one of our recommendations dealt with the distribution of powers between Ottawa and Quebec, and on that subject we stated for instance:

We would propose a basic principle that is almost automatically stated in all federal constitutions: the central government has jurisdiction in areas only that are explicitly reserved to it.

We also referred to the aspirations of Quebec to be entrenched in a new Canadian Constitution. It is surprising, honourable senators, that my friend, Mr. Pierre De Bané, should have forgotten those basic principles which we stated in 1972 in that minority report, and that leads me to reflect how promotions often change people.

The same thing goes as far as my friend, that aggressive and impatient young minister, Serge Joyal, is concerned. He also seems to have shed the cloak of Quebec nationalism that characterized him when he fought for the French language in the Gens de l'air conflict. At that time he questioned the decisions made by the Prime Minister and the Liberal cabinet on that basic principle that in air transportation people must recognize the right to use French as a working language. If someone is in a position to know how much that problem divided the cabinet at that time, it is the Speaker of this house who, to defend that principle, resigned from the cabinet during that dispute on the use of the French language in air transportation. Today, Mr. Joyal would seem to have replaced Mr.

Chrétien as the federal cabinet spokesman for Quebec. He seems to have completely forgone the nationalism that used to characterize him at that time.

Honourable senators, how power does change people, and how fast they change! Of course, I do not prejudge what our historians will write about that constitutional debate we have gone through over the past several months.

One thing is certain. The Leader of the Opposition, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, cannot be blamed for not doing his duty to try and keep Canada united. He is one of the party leaders who took the political risk of defending stubbornly the views of Quebecers—and I said “Quebecers” rather than “the Government of Quebec”. I believe those historians will write down in letters of gold his role as the party leader who was the most committed to Canadian unity.

Honourable senators, as I said a while ago, we tried everything—the Minister of State responsible for Indian Affairs in the Senate knows it because he travelled with the Prime Minister to Vancouver to meet the Indians—to tell them that the government was the native peoples’ friend, that they would not be forgotten, and in order to get the agreement of the provinces, we had negotiated for women’s rights and native people’s rights in the new Constitution. Following the steps taken by the women and the native peoples, the Minister of State took Mr. Trudeau to Vancouver saying, “Come and meet with the native peoples, come and talk to them, and then we can do something and have their rights recognized again in the Constitution”.

● (2030)

I remember how during the hearings of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution, the minister was one of those who, on the Liberal side, fought the most for native rights. He is the minister Mr. Trudeau consulted when the native rights were dropped, when the Accord was reached with eight provinces, in an effort to make the constitutional document acceptable.

It would have been easy to take one further step then and induce the Quebec government into accepting the mobility of workers. It would also have been easy, as Senator Roblin pointed out the other day, to do something more to allow the provinces that want to opt out from a program to receive financial compensation. It would have been easy to agree as well on linguistic rights, as Senator Tremblay explained during this debate. By the way, I want at this stage to point out that Senator Tremblay’s contribution was absolutely outstanding during the constitutional debate. It would have been easy to amend section 23 so that there would also be an opting-in and opting-out opportunity for Quebec. Quebec was prepared to consider the Canada clause, provided of course that the other provinces would offer the same linguistic guarantees to their own minorities. That would have been easy!

On a CTV network program this week, Mr. Chrétien said, “We are still prepared to discuss and negotiate with Quebec”. This evening I watched the question period in the House of Commons and, as it happened, my leader, Mr. Clark, was asking the following question of Mr. Trudeau: “Are you still prepared to reopen the discussions, the negotiations with Quebec?” Mr. Trudeau said no. It was possible for women and native people, but it was impossible to get the agreement or the contribution of one third of the Canadian population! It just could not be done! It just could not be done, but Mr. Chrétien did not hesitate to call the provincial premiers on the phone night and day and tell them: “Something has to be done for women and for native people. We simply must include those people in the Canadian Constitution.” It was easy and they managed to reach agreement. But with Quebec that could not be done. Again today, as this question is being debated in the Upper House of Parliament, someone has asked the Prime Minister of Canada if it was possible to reopen negotiations with Quebec on the basis which I have just mentioned and the Prime Minister has said no, it is not possible.

As a Quebecer, of course, I am none too proud about the underhanded dealings about section 133, as my colleague Senator Deschatelets said earlier tonight, especially when we read over and over again the letter sent by Premier Davis of Ontario to one of his constituents concerning the application of section 133 where it is stated quite clearly that it was negotiated with the federal government so that Ottawa would have the support of Ontario. As a Quebecer, I am saying that I do not accept that the rights of the French minority representing half a million people in Ontario were traded and negotiated in exchange for the agreement given by Ontario to Mr. Trudeau for his constitutional patriation undertaking. Mr. Trudeau has accomplished many great things as Prime Minister. However, I have the feeling that history will not think too highly of his swapping the rights of francophones in Ontario for Ontario’s agreement. We are being told that the rights of francophones in other provinces will be recognized, with regard to the teaching of French, where numbers warrant. But I think that is a big joke when one considers the statement made by the Premier of British Columbia after the constitutional conference when he was asked, in his province, what had happened, and why he had given the francophones of the province the right to their own schools. He simply answered that that would not change anything. That there was nothing to be concerned about since in the English B.C. schools French is taught up to grade six so children can learn a bit of French. This will not entitle the francophones of B.C. nor the francophones of any other province, where numbers warrant, to establish their own school boards and to control their educational decisions. No way, not one bit. This will only be an attempt at trying to accommodate them, if numbers warrant and if the courts rule in their favour. With the entrenchment of these rights in the Charter, it will no longer be up to the politicians but to the courts to decide whether numbers warrant. But on what criteria will the courts base their judgments? So far, nobody knows.

Honourable senators, there will never be enough said, throughout this whole affair and discussion, about Quebec’s isolation. Have you stopped for one minute to think what that means? Have you pondered over the situation for a moment?

On the one hand you have nine English-speaking provinces who decide to side with the federal government. I do not blame them for it. But no effort was made to try to bring Quebec to sign this historic document.

● (2040)

Of course, it is not surprising that all the French-language newspapers in Quebec have protested against this situation. I have here an editorial from Le Devoir which speaks about Quebec's isolation and whatever results it will have. If I may, I would like to read a paragraph from this article:

Those who are getting ready to seal this inequity have strong arguments to oppose those who have taken the other option in Quebec. The most authorized proponents of sovereignty were first to be found among those who believed in good faith in the need and the possibility of a new alliance between Quebec and Canada within the federal system. Many referendum allies of the leader of the Canadian government are already stating their profound disappointment that the promise made has not been kept. They feel that they have been manipulated and betrayed. Those members of this society who share the outlook that will be consecrated in the constitutional resolution form a very small group. Ottawa should realize that this entire operation affects not only the promoters of sovereignty, but also this whole society.

Honourable senators, the senators from Quebec have contacts with the people; they talk with them. They talk mostly with the ordinary citizens who may not be as well prepared as we are to judge events. However, these people are surprised that English-speaking Canada has abandoned the people of Quebec. There is still time for the Senate to rectify the situation. You have before you amendments moved by representatives of our party and others. There is still time for the Senate to accept some of these amendments and to take away from the Quebec government the possibility of saying no. It could no longer say no and it would have to say yes. This would have a great influence on the people, who would also force the Quebec government to say: Yes, we have been obstinate long enough; there have been enough conflicts between the federal government and the provinces; it is time to become reasonable and to accept to be part of this constitutional agreement!

When I came to the Senate about a decade ago, I was perhaps naïve, but I thought about what the Senate meant in Canada. I read that the Senate was an independent assembly which reflected about what occurred in the other place and examined objectively the legislation referred to it. I told myself that the Senate was important for a Quebecer because it has a role to play in our province. It was said that the Senate represented the rights of minorities, the rights of regions, the rights of provinces. Today, when I see what is being done to Quebec, to this part of Canada, I tell myself that there is no better way for the Senate to play its role and meet its responsibilities. If we do not, what will happen, honourable senators? Of course, as I have already said, Quebec will be isolated. There will be more separatists than federalists in Quebec in the future. With this constitutional action, we are losing the Quebec federalists. People are getting discouraged and they are gradually losing faith in Canada.

No one in this place wants Quebec to separate from the rest of Canada. You saw what occurred during the weekend at the Parti Québécois convention. You saw how what is now going on in Ottawa was used to make that party more radical. Within the Parti Québécois more radicals than before showed themselves off to best advantage with the people. As a Quebecer, this worries me.

Honourable senators, this is a situation which results from the attitude of confrontation, arrogance and stubbornness of those who had accepted the responsibility to give Canada a more united country, in accordance with the wishes of the two majority groups which, over a century ago, had agreed to journey together.

Some will say that I become over-emotional when dealing with this issue but it is not easy to hide one's feelings when one's province is faced with a deadlocked situation as is the case now. Unfortunately, when we vote on this resolution, it seems that this Canadian association will end. However, as a Quebecer I will have sounded the alarm, as I will have warned my English-speaking fellow citizens of the danger, of the risk faced by our country. Honourable senators, I would rather see our country united than to have this half-baked constitution patriated, which will be rejected by nearly a third of the people of my country.

I hope that in the light of the discussions which will take place, because we still have a day and a half to talk about it, we will reach some agreement on some changes. We have been told that this document cannot be altered in any way. Come on now. I feel that the people in the other place are people of good will who are going to accept reasonable amendments even if those amendments were rejected before by the Quebec government. Of course, the main objective of the Quebec provincial government is separation. But these amendments will be accepted by the people of Quebec and this is the point we want to make.

If only our purpose was to come with an amended document which would be referred back to the other place, I am convinced that our colleagues in the House of Commons would be reasonable enough to accept them. In so doing, honourable senators, I am convinced that we would be playing the role which has been ours since the beginning of Confederation, namely of serving the interests of our regions, of our Canadian minorities and our provinces. I thank you.

[English]

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Asselin: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: I listened with interest to your emotional and moving address, and one which, I think, is historic. I should like to ask, in all sincerity, whether anything can be done by this chamber, whether any amendment that might be agreed to by this chamber, would, in fact, meet with the approval of a dedicated separatist, the Premier of Quebec?

Senator Flynn: That is not the point.

Senator Buckwold: That is the question I must ask. I think it is an important one. It seems to me that the Prime Minister has done everything possible to accommodate the situation.

Senator Flynn: Don't be a joker.

Senator Buckwold: I would like to get a reaction to the question I just asked from Senator Asselin. Is there anything we can do that would make the Constitution acceptable to the Premier of Quebec?

Senator Flynn: The people of Quebec.

Senator Asselin: I think I answered that question in my speech when I said that it is not essential that any proposal or amendment we make meet the views of the Premier of Quebec. It is essential that we meet the approval of the population of Quebec. That is all that is essential.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Asselin: If the proposal is reasonable, I am sure that the population of Quebec will force Premier Lévesque and his cabinet to accept it.

Senator Flynn: Or to shut up.

Senator Asselin: Or to shut up.

Senator Smith: Put that in your pipe and smoke it for a while.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I should like to join with my colleagues in congratulating the speakers who have taken part in this debate for the high quality of their speeches and the obvious preparation and skills they have brought to them and, indeed, the varying perceptions brought to every subject within the realm of this discussion. That speaks well for the chamber and its role in such important matters.

Last April I spoke to the resolution then before us, and I am afraid that I was rather lengthy when so speaking and will attempt to avoid that this evening. In that speech I outlined the legal reasons, constitutional reasons and political reasons that dictated my decision not to support that resolution.

Since that time, three important events have occurred, namely, the so-called April Accord of the eight dissenting premiers, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada of September 28, and the so-called November Accord of the now concurring premiers and the Government of Canada. Briefly, may I deal with two rather basic but important matters that are contained in the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada?

It has been said many times over and repeated ad nauseum that those decisions determined that the government and Parliament were then proceeding and are now proceeding in a manner that is legal. According to the Oxford Dictionary,

[Senator Buckwold.]

"legal" means "permitted or not forbidden by law". What, in fact, the court said was:

There is no limit anywhere in law, either in Canada or in the United Kingdom . . . to the power of the Houses to pass resolutions.

Honourable senators, from that quotation I omitted limiting words that are contained therein in brackets. I did that deliberately to bring a greater clarity to it. They read as follows:

—(having regard to s. 18 of the British North America Act, as enacted by 1875 (U.K.), c. 38, which ties the privileges, immunities and powers of the federal Houses to those of the British House of Commons)—

Furthermore, and immediately thereafter, the majority decision went on to state:

How Houses of Parliament proceed, how a provincial Legislative Assembly proceeds, is in either case a matter of self-definition, subject to any overriding constitutional or self-imposed statutory or indoor prescription.

Honourable senators, I submit that there is a self-imposed statutory prescription to be found in section 4 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. That section reads as follows:

The Senate and the House of Commons respectively, and the members thereof respectively, hold, enjoy and exercise,

(a) such and the like privileges, immunities and powers as, at the time of passing of the British North America Act, 1867, were held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom, and by the members thereof, so far as the same are consistent with and not repugnant to that Act;

● (2100)

In other words, by passing that section, Parliament limited its own powers, privileges and immunities to those consistent with and not repugnant to the British North America Act. This resolution that we are dealing with is clearly inconsistent with and repugnant to the B.N.A. Act and that, notwithstanding the content of any nine, or indeed, all, provincial legislatures or their premiers.

Honourable senators, is this purely an academic concern? I submit to you it is not. I would like to pose these questions: What onus does this fact place upon the Speaker in this chamber who is appointed by and represents the Crown in this place? What onus does it place upon the Governor General who represents the Queen in Canada and, particularly, when he places this resolution before the Queen? Are they not bound both in honour and by constitutional convention to advise the Queen or the Governor General respectively, that this petition contains a resolution of Parliament which violates a self-imposed statutory definition as found to be the case under the Supreme Court of Canada decisions? I really want this objection of mine to be on the record, and I hope it may be taken as notice.

In my speech in April, I dealt at some length with a very real possibility that the repeal of section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster as provided for in this resolution could render the new act, being a United Kingdom statute—that is, the new Canada Act—of no force and effect in Canada.

It would appear that the Supreme Court of Canada in its majority decision recognized this danger when it said, after dealing with another argument of counsel, as follows:

—but it leaves for more anxious consideration the effect of the removal of the British North America Act from the “Statute of Westminster” and the preservation by S.7(3) of the existing distribution of legislative powers under the British North America Act.

It leaves for more anxious consideration the effect of the removal of the B.N.A. Act, that is, the repeal by this resolution of section 7(1) of that statute.

What happens if a province decides to proceed on that assumption, that is, to deny the legal applicability to Canada of this new United Kingdom statute, the Canada Act—particularly if Quebec should choose to do so?

Finally, honourable senators, what exactly did the Supreme Court of Canada say about the constitutionality of a resolution such as the one before us. It said:

We have reached the conclusion that the agreement of the provinces of Canada, no views being expressed as to its quantification, is constitutionally required for the passing of the “Proposed Resolution for a joint Address to Her Majesty respecting the Constitution of Canada” and that the passing of this Resolution without such agreement would be unconstitutional in the conventional sense.

The Supreme Court of Canada by saying “no views being expressed as to its quantification” deliberately left the definition as to what provinces, and as to what numbers of provinces, are required for agreement to our political judgment.

The question we have to decide is: Does this resolution, lacking the agreement of Quebec, comprising as it does 28 per cent of the population of Canada, and containing a people being one of the two founding races, with a distinct language and culture, constitute substantial agreement among the provinces to enable it to attain constitutional conventional recognition?

Honourable senators, I suggest we must deal with this question in an historical context, both past and future, forgetting the passions of the moment and remembering as governments over the past 200 years have come and gone, so shall governments, like the PQ government in Quebec, come and go over the next 200 years, but constitutions embody long-enduring national directions which are extremely difficult, if not impossible, to change.

Honourable senators, I should like to deal briefly with two other aspects of concern to me, namely, the two Accords of April and November, and the insertion of the suspensive veto provisions with respect to the Senate in the present resolution.

“Agreement of the provinces” within the meaning of the Supreme Court of Canada decision means to me agreement in the full sense—that is, agreement that is not attained under duress. In my opinion, the April Accord of the eight dissenting provinces was made under duress imposed by the federal government and of the Ontario government and, because of its small size, to a lesser extent by the Government of New Brunswick. The confrontational tactics employed by federal ministers, the imposition of artificial deadlines by the cabinet, and the threat to act unilaterally were all federal in origin. Indeed, the national mockery imposed upon the eight dissenting premiers was created by the criticism of federal cabinet ministers, mainly to the effect that the provincial premiers could not even agree among themselves. That, again, put those provinces under duress and forced the April Accord.

I think it must be remembered that the unrelenting initiative, drive and time frames imposed on all the provinces since September 1980 have been imposed by the federal government. Those same considerations apply equally and with the same validity to the November Accord as it affects the provinces. If we can lend any credibility to the thesis Senator Deschatelets suggested this afternoon, that the sudden overnight switch by the seven dissenting premiers to become concurring premiers was brought about by a realization that the federal government would continue to proceed unilaterally in full recognition of the fact that the resolution would be turned down in the United Kingdom. If that is true, it is one of the most shocking things I have ever heard because it represents an irresponsibility with respect to Canada as a nation that is inconceivable, and it also suggests a path towards constitutional war with the United Kingdom and, I suppose, ultimately the gratification of a unilateral declaration of independence.

May I turn for a moment to the reintroduction of the constitutional suspensive veto. As a result of the reintroduction of that suspension, a veto now remains solely in the hands of the House of Commons, on the one hand, or in the hands of any four provinces—and I am not referring to those specific matters such as the monarchy, lieutenant governors, and the Supreme Court, as contained in section 41, where, of course, unanimity is required.

As I view the scene, henceforth Ontario alone will be the pivot on which Canada turns politically and constitutionally for the indefinite future. Coming from Ontario, I should perhaps applaud that result, but I do not; and if that was bought, and the rejection of section 133 in Ontario was bought, for the price of Ontario support for this resolution, then Premier Davis and his government should go down in historic ignominy.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lang: As a result of the reintroduction of that suspensive veto, and the inclusion of the powers of the Senate under section 42 of the resolution, the 1979 judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada on the Senate reference of that year is nullified. The primary reason for the existence of the Senate as a constitutional balance wheel is gone. Sir John A. Macdonald’s words, which were quoted in that same reference—and they are so familiar to us—are as follows:

Therefore is it that the three great divisions are there equally represented for the purpose of defending such interest against the combination of majorities in the Assembly.

Those words will now be rendered obsolete, as will the words of the Honourable George Brown, quoted in that same judgment. He said:

Our Lower Canada friends have agreed to give representation by population in the lower house on the express understanding that they shall have equality in the upper house.

Those words will go into history as an anachronism.

Again, as a result, section 17 of the B.N.A. Act, which says that there shall be one Parliament for Canada consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons, will also be rendered obsolete as it concerns the Senate; while at the same time, under section 41 of the resolution, the Queen, the Governor General, the lieutenant governors, and, for the first time, the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada, are entrenched—but not the Senate.

While retaining, at least for a short time, the never-used absolute veto in non-constitutional matters, the Senate's constitutional veto is gone, for all practical purposes, and the first step is now paved on the road to the creation of that contraption known in Bill C-60 as the House of the Federation.

Back in the late 1960s I spoke in this chamber on the extraordinary powers concentrated in the federal executive under our parliamentary system, particularly under a situation where there is a majority government, combined with the effectiveness of party discipline over docile and ambitious party members in the House of Commons. At that time I said that the only effective counterbalance I could see might be the Senate, and probably that should be its most important concern.

The extinction of that possibility has now begun by the passage of this resolution. I am told, honourable senators, that the denegation of the Senate, brought about by its exclusion from section 41 and its inclusion in section 42, and the destruction of its historical raison d'être under section 47, was brought about at the ideological insistence of Premier Blakeney. If that is so, I should like to remind honourable senators that Saskatchewan represents 4 per cent of Canada's population, and if that is the sole reason why this came about, then it can hardly be justified in the light of that figure.

Honourable senators, my decision not to support the resolution that was before us last spring still stands today for the following reasons: I cannot support the proposition that the consent of all the provinces without Quebec is substantial consent within conventional requirements.

I cannot support the creation of a ramshackle Constitution for this country containing a Bill of Rights, the hallmark of republicanism, and entirely inconsistent with the Westminster model of parliamentary democracy—particularly a Bill of Rights flawed in every respect as this is at present. It will create far more injustice and hardship than it can ever be expected to remedy.

I cannot support a ramshackle Constitution that tries to combine the constitutional principles that historically underlie the B.N.A. Act with inconsistent mechanisms, and a Constitution which exposes the whole exercise to potential legal futility; also one that breaches Parliament's own self-imposed statutory constitutional limitations—and that notwithstanding the concurrence of any number of provincial premiers.

I cannot support a resolution which over the past year and a half has contributed to an intensity of mutual distrust and bad faith between the provinces and the federal government, and between the provinces themselves, rivalling or surpassing anything since the birth of Confederation; a resolution that at present is so obviously feeding the fires of fanaticism and separatism in Quebec.

Honourable senators, I ask you to compare the Canada of 1967, our Centennial year—when our ideals of national unity were clear, our national pride was high and our hopes for the future shone—with the present situation. Shortly after that period this whole constitutional reform exercise began. Let us compare the Canada of 1967 with the Canada of today, divided, with mutual suspicion and distrust everywhere, a Canada for which my heart bleeds.

● (2120)

Has the exercise been worth it? I ask honourable senators to examine their own hearts for the answer to that.

Honourable senators, at page 90 in the Supreme Court judgment, there is a paragraph I should like to read:

It is because the sanctions of convention rest with institutions of governor other than courts, such as the Government General, or the Lieutenant-Governor, or the Houses of Parliament, or with public opinion, and ultimately with the electorate, that it is generally said that they are political.

Honourable senators, the sanctions of convention upon which this resolution purports to be based, will rest, after its passage, with the Governor General or, ultimately, with the electorate. This resolution represents a sea change in the basis of Canadian federalism. Are the electorate to be denied their legislative verdict in this all-important matter until after it is presented to them as a fait accompli? I wonder what limitations are implicit on our Canadian democracy under our present government.

At the outset of this matter, in September of last year, honourable senators, I had hoped that constitutional amendment could be obtained in good faith, and with good will, and in order to sustain and nourish our sense of national identity and common interest. When I first read the resolution I could not believe that any government of Canada would purport to so unilaterally trench upon such established areas of provincial jurisdiction; but I still hoped a moderate position might come about which involved repatriation and an amending formula only. This obviously could not be worked out, so I am left alone to vote as my conscience and my sense of my Canada dictate.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am relieved, although I am sure not nearly as relieved as you will be, to realize that this will be my last intervention with respect to the Constitution.

I spoke previously on October 29, 1980, and March 12, 1981. I have considered it a great honour and privilege to have been a member of one of the houses of Parliament debating this most historic and, indeed, profound document, the Canadian Constitution.

I suppose that there will never be an issue that will appear to be so fundamental to this country as this particular issue. For me, as a relative newcomer, it has also been a great demonstration of the workings of Parliament. When one thinks back to the initial presentation of the proposed constitutional package and the bitterness that was evoked by the various pieces of the package, it is mind-boggling to think that we ever could have come to this point. There was such a large number of provinces against the proposal—they were called the Gang of Eight—and an opposition committed to making vast changes. One almost got the feeling that one was un-Canadian to be against it. We had also a government that I am sure we all believed then was embarked on what became known as unilateral action.

I want to make particular mention of the opposition both here and in the House of Commons, and its effectiveness in raising so many of the points that have ultimately ended up as part of the final resolution. I think a good deal of the comments of the opposition and the pressures exerted by the opposition have allowed the people, the courts and the provinces to be heard and have some input into this debate. I want to call your attention to the work done by the people in the opposition towards stemming the tide of pressure. You will remember all the deadlines that were imposed, first on debate, and then on committee hearings.

I regret to have to say that the government was not keen to go before the courts, and you will remember what we were told about the provinces, namely, that they would never agree.

On previous occasions I raised several concerns, not the least of which was the question of whether a Charter of Rights was necessary at all. This was a point of view held by me and by many others, who felt that basic human rights were better protected in a British unwritten system, as opposed to an entrenched, codified system such as they have in the United States.

I do not dispute what appears to be public acceptance. I think that most polls show that Canadians want a Charter of Rights. Many new Canadians, who, like my parents, came from countries where suppression of basic human rights was an accepted not only those of government, believe that they will be better protected by a Charter. I believe that they believe that. I do not necessarily believe that their beliefs are well founded.

I am still uneasy. I am concerned not with what might be written, but with what may be done. I am concerned about who benefits, and whether the system will do what it is intended to do. Chief Justice Burger, of the United States Supreme Court, has spoken out recently against the unfortunate tendency for general constitutional principles, designed to protect the civil liberties of citizens, to become twisted, through case by case judicial analysis, into rigid legalistic rules. A typical example of this is the "Maranda rule", inhibiting effective police work, which was not intended by the framers of the Constitution.

We must be wary, honourable senators, of the twisting or reworking of rules allowing individuals to frustrate seemingly legitimate actions of the state.

I remember as a law student reading the retelling of many fairy tales. In thinking about the Constitution I looked at the Charter and thought about the story of Little Red Riding Hood taking a basket of food to her grandmother only to find that the big bad wolf had devoured the grandmother, had dressed in her nightclothing, and upon Little Red Riding Hood's arrival, attempted to devour her.

We all remember the story of the woodcutter working nearby who heard her cries and rushed to her rescue, killing the wolf with his axe, thereby saving Little Red Riding Hood's life. As the story is told to us, the townspeople hurried to the scene and proclaimed the woodcutter a hero.

That fable, read in conjunction with the new Constitution, may well have some very serious consequences. Did not the woodcutter's actions deprive the wolf of his right to life, liberty and security in accordance with paragraph 7, or was he informed of the specific offence under paragraph 11?

Can we not expect, shortly, that there will be judicial interpretation requiring law enforcement officers, or others enforcing the law, to give fair warning. Accordingly, did the woodcutter make any warning swings before he struck the fatal blow? Was the wolf not subjected to cruel and unusual treatment or punishment, in breach of paragraph 12?

It may well be that there is no basis for charges against the wolf, and accordingly the woodcutter would have to be indicted for some form of homicide, and one can envisage that the supporters of rights under the Constitution might later burn the woodcutter's cottage in protest against violence. We could even have people coming to pay homage to the wolf, and all kinds of village officials speaking at the dedication. It would be a little touch of irony if Little Red Riding Hood herself gave the final tribute, saying that she had been selfishly grateful for the woodcutter's intervention, but that she realized in retrospect that he had over-reacted, and was in violation of the wolf's constitutional rights.

At best I share the view, honourable senators, of Senator Steuart, when he spoke in this chamber on October 31, 1980. Senator Steuart said, as reported at page 1103 of Hansard:

It also means in the final analysis that rights depend upon the broad acceptance of the people.

Later on, as reported on that same page, he referred to the problems of the Japanese Canadians during World War II, and said:

I do not say it was good and I do not say it was not a blot on our record, but it happened, and it would happen again no matter how many rights we have.

● (2130)

He later said:

If, in fact, we can improve the situation by entrenching certain rights above the relatively easy amendment of legislatures and parliaments, then perhaps that will be a step forward. But I think we should go slowly; we should be aware that doing so will not solve all our problems, and may create almost as many problems as it solves.

Senator Bosa raised the question of Great Britain looking at an entrenched Charter of Rights, to which Senator Steuart replied:

I am not saying that it is going to hurt, or lessen, the rights of individuals or groups, if they are entrenched. What I was trying to say is that it is no guarantee. When you entrench rights in a constitution people should not think that it is a guarantee that their rights are secure and sound, and well looked after forever. Nothing will take the place of the vigilance of individuals, of groups, no matter what the government, and no matter what the form of government.

Having said that, honourable senators, I suppose that I have come to the same conclusion as does Senator Steuart: this resolution does not give us a whole lot, but if people feel somewhat more comfortable with it, they ought to have it. It is a symbol and God knows we do not have enough symbols.

One of the prime reasons we are here today in the final stages of the constitutional debate is the commitment made by the Prime Minister and others to the people of Quebec. There can be no doubt, honourable senators, that Canada would not originally have come into being had Lower Canada not seen fit to participate. This whole process of constitutional reform was unleashed as a result of the referendum commitment to renew federalism. Therefore, honourable senators, it is a sad irony indeed that we are dealing with the most massive overhaul of the Constitution to date without the agreement of Quebec. I realize the difficulties involved. I am not suggesting that we take the side of Premier Lévesque, who appears unreasonable and even unwilling to negotiate. Having said that, however, I worry that we may well have gone one step forward and two steps backward. It seemed to me that the whole process of constitutional reform was to result in some sort of light at the end of the tunnel. After the events of last weekend, I worry that that light could be an onrushing train. The purpose of this process was to strengthen the country, but it may well be more fragile than ever before. Honourable senators, I hope that we can obtain the accord of the people of Quebec, if not that of the present Government of Quebec.

As a Canadian, I would dearly love to see some clear evidence that the constitutional package has the support of the majority of Quebecers. I am not referring to the government of that province.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

I do think that we have gone about this in a strange way. I understand the frustration of Quebecers. As a westerner, I, too, was frustrated. I remember the threat of unilateral action, the attitude that "those awful provinces will never agree." I felt as though I had come from a place that was somehow not part of Canada. I remember, when the hearings were initially set up, that deadline after deadline was imposed. I remember that there seemed to be a lack of willingness to go to the Supreme Court, and I remember the odious Kirby memo. Those remembrances do bring a feeling of frustration.

There is certainly hope, honourable senators, that we might go forward from here; that we might not alienate, but, rather, negotiate. If there appears to be little hope—as is the case now—let us keep the door open. Governments come and governments go. I know a little about that. The people, however, remain and must be served. Hopefully, they will be served in a united Canada.

The November 5 Accord removes, for me, some of that feeling of frustration and alienation that I felt as a Manitoban and as a westerner. But in reaching my conclusion tomorrow, I guess, if I think only of my limited constitutional responsibilities to my region and to my province, my decision will be made much easier by the Accord. In wrestling in the next minutes and hours ahead, I worry about looking at this thing in the broader perspective.

More specifically today, however, I want to address myself to the amendment proposed by my colleague, Senator Macquarrie, and deal specifically with section 42 and the amendment proposed by him and seconded by me. Briefly, as has been outlined by my colleague, section 42 indicates that the extension of existing provinces into the territories may be made by an amendment pursuant to section 38(1), which is an amendment that can be made upon resolution of the two houses of Parliament and of two-thirds of the legislative assemblies of the provinces having more than 50 per cent of the population.

I speak now specifically of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, two territories that cannot be established as provinces without the consent of at least eight governments. That is certainly a reversal of the present law, under which the authority to establish new provinces resides exclusively with the Parliament of Canada. I understand the argument of Senator Lucier that the Conservative interpretation is that there must be unanimity of all provinces. The Conservative position on all constitutional change has required unanimity. But it is certainly Senator Lucier's view that the law has been that the federal government, by the Act of 1871, has exclusive jurisdiction to create provinces. That being the case, that has now been changed. This is certainly a reversal of that law, and in order to establish new provinces the consent of at least seven provinces and of the federal government is required.

I am sure all honourable senators have received a copy of a letter from George Braden, Co-Chairman of the Special Committee on the Constitution of Canada, Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories. Let me refer briefly to his request that the amendment as proposed by Senator Macquarrie be supported in this chamber. He says:

Now—for the first time in Canadian history—it seems that provinces will be permitted to exercise extra-territorial jurisdiction over citizens of Canada living beyond their borders.

Our Legislative Assembly maintains that, in the interests of the people of the North, the special relationship between the Territories and the Government of Canada should be preserved. We believe that our sentiments are no different from those of the people of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba before they were formed as provinces out of the old North West Territories.

He then urges support of the amendment.

I would not like it to be misunderstood, honourable senators, as a present-day reality. I do not think that northerners want the territories to become provinces today or, indeed, tomorrow. But why could they not be treated as were the pioneers of my province, or the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, which were able to attain provincial status by virtue of the 1867 and the 1871 British North America Acts? The whole purpose of having a Constitution and, indeed, of having it brought home to Canada is so that it will be a made-in-Canada Constitution—made for Canadians and by Canadians.

A “speaker’s kit,” prepared by the government and given to each of us when the constitutional package was first proposed, said that one of the purposes of the Constitution was “to reduce regional disparities.”

Honourable senators, the obstacle course placed in front of the dreams and aspirations of the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories to one day attain provincehood seems to me to promote regional disparity. It makes second-class citizens out of people who, it seems to me, have to work harder, endure more severe climatic hardships, and pay more for their goods than do southern Canadians, and who generally have a harder time existing in our country than do the rest of us. To these people we say: “Work hard; forget about the cold; forget about the conveniences your fellow Canadians have, and, if after a time we can convince eight governments to recognize you on an equal footing, then some day, my friends, you might become a province.” Could we tell a fellow from the Northwest Territories to read what the little speaker’s kit says:

● (2140)

To be of value a Constitution must meet the needs of the citizens.

Can we honestly say that hopping, skipping and jumping through eight governments will help meet the needs of a citizen of the Northwest Territories or the Yukon? Do we not have this thing all backwards? Because of the hardships and the inequities, should it not be easier for those hardy souls living up there in the north?

On October 29, 1980, I addressed a similar concern about the entire consultative process, the question of consulting minorities of all kinds. At that time, I talked about that particular section of the Charter of Rights that negated preferential hiring and training provisions under the terms of the Northern Pipeline Act. This appeared to breach the earlier section dealing with mobility.

At that time I said that the concern in my view was not necessarily the legal disposition—that is, not as to whether the Northern Pipeline Act would supersede the Charter or vice versa. The concern I had was that the Yukon government had not been consulted on these essential matters of importance. At the time I had said to that small group, which numbered perhaps 20,000 or 30,000, a minority group, that minorities are supposed to be protected under the new Constitution. Yet, these Canadians had been systematically held at arm’s length by this government through the entire constitutional process, and now it seems that we have placed an obstacle course in front of them which makes it more difficult rather than easier to become one of us.

I have always stressed the need and requirement for consensus among all the governments of Canada, both provincial and federal. To that end, I support the Accord reached on November 5, but I urge the government to support this amendment, and, as a result, compel further consultation with the provincial governments to get them to agree to the removal of these objectionable sections.

Let this package represent, not only the fulfillment of our historic aspirations as a country, but the framework and the basis for future growth as a nation and as a people. But let it include all the people. Let us not forget the 60,000 or so who live in remote regions. We have come to this point because of the urging of many to be reasonable and to sit down and talk to each other. Will we not be regarded as having achieved that much more if we do not forget those in the far-flung regions who may well be sitting on the resources of tomorrow.

Honourable senators, accordingly, I endorse the amendment moved by Senator Macquarrie and urge you to do so.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, as I have listened to this debate in which we have been involved, I believe I can say that it is one of the finest debates we have had in this chamber. It is a debate on a very serious issue, and a debate about which most of us feel very strongly, because it strikes at the very roots of our country. In spite of these profound emotions, there has been a minimum of name-calling or bitter recrimination. The debate has been on the highest level.

One thing that has struck me about the debate is that we have been able to reach unanimity on one matter. Whether one is in favour of the resolution or opposed to it, there is unanimous agreement that it is not perfect. Those who oppose the resolution have spent much of their time pointing out the bad features. They feel that the bad elements of the resolution outweigh the good qualities. Others, the group to which I belong, feel that the good qualities outweigh the bad, and that in the interest of Canada we should proceed at this time. I suppose one could put it another way—it is the difference between the optimists and the pessimists. In this matter, I am an optimist.

Senator Murray: How about the realists?

Senator Molgat: I believe that we live in the best country in the world and that by working together we can make it even better. I do not accept the comments made this afternoon by one of my friends across the way, who talked about the dangers of going forward. I believe there are greater dangers in standing still—Senator Flynn: You just have to make concessions.

Senator Molgat: —or going backwards. We have to do the best we can and move ahead. If, in the process, we expect to satisfy everyone on every issue, then, quite obviously, we will do nothing. I think that is the situation with which we are faced. Either we take certain steps and move along or we will be in the same situation that we have been in since Confederation and, certainly, for the past 50 years when trying to proceed with amendments.

I believe that members of the Canadian public, in general, take that position. I do not think they are happy with every item in the Charter, for example, and I think they said so when they appeared before the joint committee. In general, they have said two things: "We want the Constitution patriated; and we want it to include a Charter of Rights." There has been disagreement over the details, but there has been general agreement in Canada over those two basic items.

During the debate in this chamber earlier this spring and last fall, one of the points of discussion which came up regularly—and it has been raised by the public as well—was the question of the process. There has been a constantly recurring call for a made-in-Canada Constitution. I do not know how a Constitution made in the House of Commons and in the Senate is not a made-in-Canada Constitution. However, that argument was used because there was no general agreement with the provinces.

In many ways I share that concern, and I am delighted that the process was changed and that there was further consultation with the provinces. While there has not been complete agreement—and that is one of the weaknesses—there has been very substantial agreement, moving from the agreement of two provinces to the agreement of nine provinces.

Senator Flynn: I'm so happy.

Senator Molgat: The other concern that was expressed at that time was, "Well, why not let the courts decide this matter?" That was part of the argument raised concerning the process. Well, the courts did decide the matter. You can disagree with the decision of the courts, but the courts did make a decision.

Senator Flynn: You misinterpreted it too.

Senator Molgat: Subsequent to that, further action was taken. On November 5, when an agreement was reached, I think there was a general feeling of relief, which is one way of putting it; enthusiasm on the part of others but, certainly, a general feeling that we had moved forward in Canada—that we had made a substantial forward step in the development of our nationhood. Since then we have been going through the process of, bit by bit, snipping here and cutting off there and opposing this and opposing that.

Senator Murray: Just in regard to the rights of women and aboriginals; that is all.

Senator Molgat: If we are not careful, we will end up by once again simply throwing up our hands and saying that we cannot do anything. Frankly, I cannot accept that as the best solution. I think the time has come to move forward.

If we were to move forward and, at the same time, end in a situation with no possibility of further change, then, obviously, we would have to reconsider. However, the facts are that, once we have patriated the Constitution, we have actually opened avenues for further amendment. Patriation will make change much easier than it has been in the past because we will have an amending formula.

Senator Flynn: For the worse, not for the better.

Senator Molgat: In the past we have been shackled by the theory of unanimity; if not legal unanimity, at least the fact that there had been a practice where provinces were consulted. Instead of moving ahead, we have been waiting and waiting. I believe that we are now over that hurdle and that once we have the Constitution in Canada we can proceed with the amendment process, and, obviously, that will have to be done.

In one particular respect, I suppose, because of the region from which I come, I frankly feel that the amending procedure now proposed is superior to that contained in the resolution which was before us last spring. I have always had reservations about an amending procedure which made some provinces different from others.

● (2150)

Some provinces had a veto and others did not. I found it extremely difficult to justify that my province had to have two other provinces in western Canada agreeing with it before its voice could really be effective, whereas Ontario or Quebec, acting by themselves, could exercise that veto power. The new formula in this regard is a substantial improvement, in my opinion.

I wish now to turn to the question of the Charter of Rights. It is a question of opinion, as far as I am concerned. Quite frankly, coming from a provincial legislature background some 12 years ago, I started off as one opposed to an entrenched Charter.

Senator Asselin referred to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, and there are a number of other senators present who were members of that joint committee. At that time I did not support the idea of an entrenched Charter of Rights, but as we travelled across Canada and heard all the arguments presented, frankly, I changed my mind and came to the conclusion that in the Canadian scene an entrenched Charter is the proper answer. Again, it is not perfect, but in the light of our circumstances, a better answer.

Our institutions are based on the British parliamentary system and the British judicial system. I am not from that background from an ethnic standpoint, but I admire that system. Compared to the ones I have looked at, I think it is the best system to run our human affairs, but we have inherited it from a different circumstance. We have inherited it, first of all, from a country much smaller than ours; a country with long, long traditions and a great deal of stability; a country that could develop those institutions over a long period; a country with a more homogenous population than ours, and a country that does not have a federal structure.

So, when you look at Canada, I think you have to say that it is not on a par with the British system, and that, therefore, a Charter of Rights which may not suit the British may be a different thing here. I have come to the conclusion that it is a different thing and that a Charter of Rights is necessary in a country like Canada, a country basically made up of minorities.

Let me give you a specific instance, an instance which took place in my own province of Manitoba. When Manitoba joined confederation in 1870 it had a small population, less than 12,000, roughly half English-speaking and half French-speaking. As a result of an agreement—and I will not go through all the history of it—and because of that population structure, it was agreed that the province would be bilingual. Schools were bilingual; the legislature was bilingual. As immigrants came, quite obviously the nature of the province changed. It became a province dominated by English-speaking people with the French-speaking people becoming a minority. Accordingly, the legislature became dominated by English-speaking representatives, as one would expect, and in 1890 and in 1916 the provincial legislature abolished the rights of the French-speaking community.

How was that done? Well, it was done by the majority process, the perfectly proper legislative process, but in the course of that the rights of the minority were removed.

In 1961 I became Leader of the Opposition in that province. My honourable friend who sits across the way from me now, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, Senator Roblin, was the Leader of the Government. So, we sat in the same position in which we are seated now, only reversed vis-à-vis the Speaker. I want to make it clear that I have never attributed to my honourable friend any ill will in this regard. On the contrary, I think that he shared the concern that my group, the Liberal Party of Manitoba, had in this regard.

What did we try to do? We tried to change the Public Schools Act in a very minor way because that act, as a result of the majority in the legislature, had changed from where it originally said that the language of instruction shall be English and French, to the removal of the words "and French." Therefore, we on the Liberal side proposed amendments to reintroduce those two words "and French." What happened? Honourable senators, the legislature persistently turned us down—on all sorts of subterfuges, I might add. They ruled it out of order, and found all sorts of reasons why it should not be done.

I do not think the Leader of the Government at that time was opposed to that principle but he was shackled himself by that majority in his party, who simply could not agree. I do not really blame them as individuals, because they saw Canada through their eyes with the background that they had. They had been living in a province that was almost wholly English, and they could not see why this was important or why it should be done.

Senator Roblin: They did eventually.

Senator Molgat: I have never thought it was ill will, but the result was the tyranny of the majority, a majority which exercised its will and imposed it on the minority, in this case, my own group—not the Liberal group, but the French-speaking group. It is for that reason I believe that we need a Charter. We need a charter to protect the minorities. We need a Charter so that these circumstances do not occur.

[Translation]

I would now like to say a few words about the situation in the Province of Quebec. I agree wholeheartedly with those who regret the fact that the Government of Quebec did not choose to participate in this agreement. We share the same language, though my accent and expressions may not be quite the same as those heard in Quebec—as my Acadian colleague said, it is mainly a matter of geography—and we have the same attachment to the Canadian duality that Quebec federalists have, and the same conviction that being able to speak two languages in Canada is a tremendous advantage. We also realize that having two cultures can only be a source of enrichment.

With you, I regret that the Government of Quebec is not a participant. However, I think we should realize that in the circumstances, it was highly unlikely that the present government would participate. After all, although it may not have been elected on a separatist and indépendantiste slate but rather as a government which favoured sovereignty-association, this is a government that does not believe in the Canadian Confederation and wants to establish an independent Quebec.

How can we expect this government to decide to participate now and sign an agreement, if basically it is against the concept? So we should not be surprised if the Government of Quebec does not take any action.

When I listened to my colleague, Senator Asselin, say several times that the people of Quebec are the ones we should be concerned about, I had to agree. Unfortunately, it seemed to me that the expressions he used were mostly of the kind used by separatists. When he told us: "The Quebecers are disappointed", "the English-speaking provinces have pushed them out", and here I think I can give a direct quote:

We have ignored the views of 26 per cent of the Canadian population.

Later he said:

That English Canada forced—

To me, those are separatist words.

Senator Asselin: I knew you would use that stupid argument.

Senator Molgat: It may be a stupid argument, but that is what I heard separatists say.

Senator Flynn: It doesn't matter who says it if it is true.

Senator Molgat: When Senator Flynn has finished, I will go on. So, I was talking about the people of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: Yes, indeed.

Senator Molgat: And I do not think that the Government of Quebec necessarily speaks for all Quebecers. When people say it represents 26 per cent of the Canadian population, I agree, but not necessarily the views of all 26 per cent.

Senator Flynn: That is what the National Assembly thinks.

Senator Molgat: That is something else again.

Senator Asselin: And what about Mr. Ryan's support?

Senator Molgat: To say that English Canada has exerted pressure that's another thing. Canada is not all English-speaking. And the House of Commons—is it an English institution as such? What I hear at home is that the House of Commons is Quebec controlled. This is what I hear people all over the country complain about. However, those 74 members who sit there—and for reasons of partisanship you refuse to admit it they are representatives of Quebec. That is your favourite theme. But the fact remains that these 74 members have been duly elected in the province of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: Without any mandate to negotiate.

Senator Molgat: They represent their constituents very well. They have more contacts with them than my colleagues who sit here and pretend to defend the interests of Quebec. Therefore I think that the arguments presented here are exactly what the Quebec government or the separatist party wants people to hear. If you want to repeat them, it is your business. But don't you believe that this will convince everyone or the rest of the Canadian people—

Senator Flynn: Especially not you.

Senator Molgat: Well, if you wish to repeat separatist comments, that's your affair.

Senator Asselin: That is a weak argument.

Senator Molgat: That is your business. It is up to you to decide. At any rate, we do regret that the Province of Quebec cannot fully take part in this Accord. It has to be recognized however that the agreement offers certain benefits which I thought would be significant for Quebec.

Senator Flynn: Such as, for instance?

Senator Molgat: One is that we recognize the dual status of the country and that from now on everywhere in Canada, French education to which I was referring earlier, will be confirmed. As of now the Quebec people who want to go and work in another province will be able to do so and their children will be taught in their own language, which wasn't the case in the past. If we want to become a nation I think this is essential. We cannot force the Quebec people, we should not force anyone for that matter, to remain in their own province, in their own area, if they wish to go and work somewhere else. If they want to improve their lot, if they find job opportunities in another province, it certainly would be a serious mistake to force them to stay home and not allow them services elsewhere in their mother tongue.

I could mention other things. As far as the educational language is concerned the resolution makes only one exception, and it is for the province of Quebec. All the other provinces are bound by the resolution before us. But Quebec is the only exception. Therefore I think that we can contemplate the future with hope and expect that when the Constitution has been repatriated, we shall be able to carry on the discussion not only with the Province of Quebec but with all the other provinces and attempt to improve on what we are starting here today.

[English]

Honourable senators, a number of amendments have been proposed, some of which have been proposed by my honourable friends across the chamber, who, in the early discussion on the Constitution, made a great deal of the point that the provinces must be heard, that the great weakness in what the government was trying to do previously was that it was not consulting with the provinces, that it had the views of only two provinces—two provinces agreeing with it—and that it should listen to the provinces.

● (2200)

Well, on November 27 Mr. Bennett, speaking for the provinces, sent the following telegram:

I am writing to you on behalf of the nine provinces that signed the November 5 constitutional Accord. The agreement reached in Ottawa is a significant achievement in the affairs of our nation and was only possible through compromise on the part of all of us. I have been asked by my colleagues to inform you that additional constitutional change should only be considered in Canada following the patriation of our Constitution. My colleagues and I believe that further negotiation must not put at risk the Accord, and that the package should be approved by Parliament as it now stands and proceeded with without further delay.

Well now, my friends, you cannot have it both ways.

Senator Murray: Indeed, you cannot.

Senator Molgat: You would love to, but that is not how life works, unfortunately. When you come down to life you realize that you cannot, on the one hand, say that you should listen to the provinces, and then, on the other hand, say, when it does not suit you, that you should ignore the provinces and just go ahead on your own.

Senator Flynn: There was never any objection by Mr. Bennett to any accommodation with Quebec. That is not true.

Senator Molgat: Well, if my honourable friend would like me to read the telegram again, I will read it to him again.

Senator Flynn: He referred to rights for women and Indian rights, and so on and so forth, which were not in the resolution, but had been mentioned previously. It is in general terms.

Senator Molgat: I do not know, then, what a phrase like his closing sentence means, which says:

My colleagues and I believe that further negotiation must not put at risk the Accord and that the package should be approved by Parliament as it now stands and proceeded with without further delay.

Senator Flynn: He referred to rights for women and aboriginal rights.

Senator Molgat: If that means there should be further negotiation, then my honourable friend certainly reads this in a very different way than I do.

Senator Flynn: But if you do not understand, then that is the end of it.

Senator Molgat: My honourable friend, with his legal background, I know, is a very learned gentleman, but I would ask him to read it, and interpret it, and if he says that that means there should be more negotiation, then I cannot read English.

Senator Flynn: The government was free to negotiate with Quebec.

Senator Molgat: The facts are that my honourable friend does not like it because it does not suit his argument.

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

Senator Molgat: He is all in favour as long as the provinces say the things that he wants to hear; but the moment the provinces say something different, then he takes the position that the provinces should not be listened to.

Well, have that argument if you want—

Senator Flynn: Then you agree that nine provinces are imposing their will on Quebec—is that what you are saying?

Senator Molgat: No.

Senator Flynn: What are you saying, then?

Senator Molgat: I am simply telling you that a few months ago you were using the argument that we should listen to the provinces.

Senator Flynn: I am still using it.

Senator Molgat: And when we listen to the provinces, you use the argument that we should not listen to them this time.

Senator Flynn: I am not going to impose anything on your province, and I do not want anything to be imposed on Quebec. That is the difference. If it is beyond your understanding, too bad.

Senator Molgat: My honourable friend does not want to follow this argument. He wants to have another one.

Senator Flynn: No, no, no. I am willing to follow yours, if it makes sense.

Senator Molgat: You can tell Mr. Bennett, who sent the telegram, that his English is not understandable, then. To me, however, it is very clear: "Cease. Do not accept any further amendments. Proceed now." That is what it basically says.

Senator Flynn: You forget the context.

Senator Molgat: So I think the time has come when we have to make that decision, and I repeat what I said at the outset. Quite obviously, it is not going to suit us in every particular. It does not suit you, and it does not suit me. There are certain things I would like to see done differently; but I still believe that, on balance, the good from the standpoint of Canada in proceeding now in this way outweighs the bad, and for this reason I am going to support the resolution.

Senator Flynn: Surprise!

Senator Molgat: And because I am convinced of its overall general benefit I will support it enthusiastically, because I think it will lead us to an opportunity to do greater service to our people in every province in the future.

● (2210)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I did not anticipate re-entering the debate to talk about the Manitoba school question or the Manitoba language question. However, since they have been brought up, I hope I will be permitted to offer a slightly different version of the situation from that which has just been presented to us.

It is perfectly true that in 1890 the Liberal government of Mr. Greenway abolished the French rights in education in Manitoba in certain respects, as indeed he did with regard to confessional schools. It is perfectly true, as well, that in 1916 Mr. Norris, who was the Liberal premier at that time, put the "finishing touches" to the French language in Manitoba by making its use illegal in the schools of our province. It is perfectly true that, before I became the Premier of Manitoba, we had an administration which was led by Liberals or Liberal Progressives for 43 years, during all of which time, as far as I can recall, nothing was done either about the language or the religious question.

When I came into office in 1958, it seemed to me that this was a problem that probably should be tackled by a government, even though I recognized, from the difficult experience of the Liberal Party during the 43 years before my advent into office, that it was something that probably would create more prejudicial discontent in our people, in some way, than if the matter were completely left alone. However, honourable senators, I had to admit that, on consideration of the problem and on listening to many suggestions—among which were those of the Honourable Senator Molgat—it was a subject that I did not feel, in my conscience, I could continue to ignore for another 43 years.

We attempted, therefore, to ameliorate the situation. I am not going to make any exaggerated claims for what happened in Manitoba during the sixties, because I did not feel at the time that we went as far as we might probably have been expected to go. I knew, however, that we went as far as we possibly could go. We did accomplish this during that time: we broke the ice. We no longer considered these subjects to be out of bounds in terms of reform or change. We reorganized the school districts of Manitoba so that those Manitobans who had French as their primary language at home were, as far as was humanly possible—and believe me, we drew up some pretty funny boundaries in order to do this—placed in the same school divisions. In this way, the school boards to whom we gave the right to reintroduce the French language into the schools of Manitoba would find themselves with the voting power and authority to do so within those school divisions which were framed with the francophone Manitoban problem in mind.

I am not willing to say that the things we did during my time in office were beyond improvement. It is only correct to say that after Mr. Schreyer became Premier of Manitoba he made another step in this direction. I may say as well that when Mr. Lyon became Premier of Manitoba he made another step in this direction. The result is that today in the province of Manitoba—I think I may say this without contradiction, and I think Senator Molgat would probably agree with me—we have a situation where any Manitoban child who wants to be educated in the French language, with very few exceptions, can now attend a French-speaking school where he can take the entire syllabus in the French language. We have in the Department of Education in Manitoba a structure that has been established to cater to this requirement and this need.

Honourable senators, for these accomplishments I am loath to claim any credit. I would never have dreamed of mentioning this subject if it had not been presented to us. I am not saying this in any critical way, because Senator Molgat did his very best for the French-speaking people in Manitoba when he was a member of the opposition. I know that at that time he gave me plenty of very good advice. I am not making any claim to perfection, but I am saying that our administration broke the ice, because we had the conviction that it was the proper thing to do. We took the first step that was necessary in order to reinstate the rights of French-speaking Manitobans, which rights had been lost over these many years.

While I am on the subject, I may say as well that we did the same thing with respect to confessional schools. We took the first step in breaking the ice in this regard by providing a form of public support, which has been an anathema maranatha in the province of Manitoba for years. It could not be done; it could not be mentioned.

I am not saying that we did very much, but we did what was essential by breaking the ice and making it possible for others in the course of time to do better. That is precisely what happened both in respect of French and confessional schools. We broke the ice.

To those who succeeded me I give credit in full measure: to Mr. Schreyer, when he was Premier of Manitoba; and to Mr. Lyon, when he was Premier of Manitoba. Those two gentlemen followed in the way which had been opened up and they produced a system in my province which, while not perfect, I suppose, nevertheless goes a long way in bringing back to Manitoba the rights of French-speaking Canadians, in particular, and also of confessional schools in a substantial way. If there are further improvements to be made, no doubt the new government in Manitoba will consider them.

[Senator Roblin.]

I wanted to say these things, because one must not think of the tyranny of the majority as being something that cannot be overcome, given reason and time. I must say that in Manitoba it took a devil of a long time, from 1890 all the way through to the 1960s. I have to say that I was responsible only for the latter part, that little time when the ice was broken. But there still is in Manitoba a large majority of anglophones, and that majority was brought round to the position that French-speaking Manitobans have rights and that those rights ought to be recognized and ought to be given effect. That was done in a parliamentary manner by a majority, which, I suppose, if it had been left to its original or first thoughts on the matter, would probably have decided that it was just not worth the trouble of looking into. But it was done. It was done by an anglophone majority, and we now have a situation with respect to the French language in Manitoba which I think most Manitobans would agree is suitable and fitting for the circumstances of the province.

I really had no thought of intervening in this discussion. I know Senator Molgat said nothing of a critical nature. He simply exposed a problem, and I agree with him that it was a problem. But I thought it would be well to give perhaps a broader picture from another point of view of what took place and where we stand now.

That is one reason why, while I appreciate the enormous emotional and intellectual appeal of rigid entrenchment in the Constitution, I say that, if we had rigidly entrenched our position in 1890 or in 1916, we would be far worse off now. But we did not do that. What we did was bad enough, in that we let a really undefendable period of time lapse before anything was done to remedy the situation. That was bad enough. So I am happy that we have entrenchment, but one which is capable of amendment by the legislative authorities, should that ever be required.

I do not anticipate that there will be many laws passed in this country that will modify in any important particular the rights laid down in the Bill of Rights, unless it is clearly demonstrated and obvious to the electors and the people who support them that these changes are indeed in the public interest.

I add those few words, and I hope that those members of the Senate who for many long years have been concerned about the status of French outside the province of Quebec will think about one province which went through this traumatic experience in spades and eventually, in my opinion, came out on the right side of the argument, producing a system which is just and equitable to those who speak French as well as to those who speak English in my province. I would not like it to be thought that Manitoba has not moved forward since those days of 1890 and 1916. I like to think that the 1960s, whether under my direction or under somebody else's, were productive and helpful in building a more united province.

Senator Molgat: I agree with you with respect to the present situation, yes. It is quite acceptable. Is it not correct, however, that during all the time to which I was referring we tried to have the act amended to read that French would be a language of instruction, and yet that was never done?

Senator Roblin: We did amend the Education Act of Manitoba to make it possible to teach French in the schools of our province in a way which had been forbidden by law previously. We certainly made some changes in our provincial legislation that broke the ice. I am quite certain that we did.

• (2220)

Senator Molgat: I would be very happy if the honourable gentleman would bring us those facts, because my recollection is that every time we tried to change the act we were opposed.

Senator Roblin: We did not accept your ideas because we had some pretty good ideas of our own.

Senator Molgat: The idea we had was simple—to add French-language instruction.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I am no expert on either the modern or the early history of Manitoba. I shall leave that to the former Premier and the former Leader of the Opposition of that province to discuss. However, I must say that I was intrigued by the way in which Senator Molgat managed to telescope the history of the Manitoba schools question which was writ so large on our national history and consciousness. It seemed to me that he managed to avoid very neatly any reference to the role played in that affair by Premier Greenway and the Liberal party of that day.

Without rehashing all that history, I suggest to the honourable senator and to others who are interested in the subject that one speech they might read with profit is that of Sir Charles Tupper during the debate of the Parliament of Canada on bringing in remedial action. I suggest that the position taken by Tupper and the Conservatives of that day does much more honour to them than does the position taken by Greenway and even by Laurier in Parliament.

Senator Thériault: What was the end result of that action?

Senator Murray: The end result of that action, unfortunately, was that Tupper and the Tories lost the ensuing federal election in 1896, and, as a result, were unable to implement the remedial action which they proposed.

In any case, without rehashing all that history, I was also very interested to hear Senator Molgat rationalize the history of the Manitoba school question in terms of demographics. Suddenly, he tells us, the population of Manitoba became majority English-speaking, opinions and legislation changed and the majority was able to impose its will on the minority. I ask the honourable senator and others: In terms of English Canada vis-à-vis Quebec, is that not exactly what is being proposed in the measure that is now before us?

I am always intrigued by the intellectual gymnastics of some honourable senators. A year ago they would brook no opposition from eight of the ten provinces of Canada. A couple of months ago, after the Supreme Court handed down its decision, they agreed, in the words of Senator Molgat, that "the provinces must be heard." Tonight Senator Molgat implies that to be committed to the process of provincial consultation is to be committed to whatever the process produces, even if the end result excludes the Province of Quebec. That argument would make Parliament a cipher, and it is an argument that I, for one, can never accept. I was also interested to hear Senator Molgat express his reservations about so many provisions of the original resolution. I cannot forbear to state that he might have saved Parliament and the country a great deal of time and grief had he and his colleagues on that side—who suddenly have identified flaws in the old resolution—been able to perceive them earlier.

Honourable senators, we have heard some very learned legal arguments tonight, and I should like to make a political argument—I hope not in a narrow sense, but in a broader sense.

Since 1763, the reconciliation and mutual accommodation of the English and French peoples has been the single greatest historic challenge facing us on this part of the North American continent in building a stable and prosperous national community. Several generations of European statesmen and every generation of Canadian leaders have addressed this challenge with more or less success and more or less honour to themselves.

I need not recount the purposes of the Act of 1774; the Act of 1791; the events of the 1830s, 1840s, 1850s, and the 1860s; the attempts to find a constitutional and political modus vivendi that would satisfy our people, the hopes and frustrations, and sometimes violence; the progress; always the politics; and sometimes the statesmanship that led to Confederation in 1867.

Suffice to say that, yes, we are making history here tonight and tomorrow, but 1981 will represent just another chapter, just another date in that political history which goes back to 1763 and the formal end of armed conflict between England and France on our soil.

Our history, since 1763, has not been one of unrelenting political progress and stability—far from it. The longest period of relative progress and stability has been the period since 1867, "the Confederation years", as they would be known by history if they were to end soon.

Our history should be a warning to us never to take our future stability for granted. In all humility, we should ask ourselves whether the step we are about to take will be seen, in the future, as having strengthened Confederation or having been its undoing. Is it a step forward, as Senator Molgat has suggested, or a serious, and perhaps fatal, step backwards?

The Act of 1867—one more date in our history—was designated as a partnership among provinces and a partnership between the English and French peoples in this country. Confederation would not have come into being unless those who at that moment had the leadership of those provinces and of those peoples agreed to it. Confederation would have floundered if Quebec, which had the largest French-speaking population, had not come on board voluntarily.

Whatever I know of the history of our country, and everything I know or believe about the nature of our country, tells me that no Canadian Constitution can endure that does not have the support of both Quebec and English Canada in general.

Senator Flynn: Right on!

Senator Murray: The evidence indicates that this measure lacks the necessary support of Quebec. The evidence shows that a majority of the National Assembly of Quebec, representing government and opposition parties, does not support the measure.

● (2230)

All the evidence I have seen indicates that the people of Quebec, a majority of the people in Quebec, want the two governments to continue to negotiate rather than allow this measure to pass the Parliament here and at Westminster.

Does Quebec have a veto? The courts will be called upon to render a judicial decision on that. I believe that most Canadians acknowledge, as an essential fact of our national existence, that Quebec has had and does have a veto on changes which affect her own status and the powers of her legislature. I say that it is mindless to argue, as the Right Honourable the Prime Minister argues in his letter of December 1 to Premier Lévesque, as if Canadian history on this question began not 100 years ago, but 13 years ago.

This measure was born of a constitutional consensus of which Quebec is not a part. The Charter of Rights, the fact that we will now have an amending formula, even the achievement of patriation, in my opinion, are vastly outweighed by the definitive, historic fact of Quebec's exclusion and opposition. That being the case, this Constitution cannot last and will not last. It does not have the dual consensus of support which is an essential element of survival in this country.

I am sure there will be a celebration here tomorrow evening, and there is supposed to be some sort of celebration at Rideau Hall the evening after. How I fervently wish that I could share in that celebration, but I cannot because I believe that the euphoria of December 2, when this measure was passed by the House of Commons, and the euphoria of tomorrow evening, or Wednesday evening, when it may be passed by the Senate, will be short lived.

I believe that this Constitution, which does not have the support of Quebec, will blow up in our faces. I believe that the euphoria will be ashes in our mouths. In saying that, I share the hope of those who say that the necessary changes can be made using the new amending formula to reconcile Quebec to what has been done without her concurrence, but that is a pretty thin reed to lean on, and it is certainly too thin to justify my support for this measure, as it now stands.

[Translation]

Several amendments were proposed by my colleagues from the Progressive Conservative Party. I refer in particular to the amendments introduced by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and Senator Tremblay. It seems that those amendments could draw enough support in Quebec to justify parliamentary approval of the resolution and make it acceptable to the people of Quebec.

[Senator Murray.]

[English]

With these amendments I can support this resolution. Without them, Canada would have a Constitution approved by the federal Parliament and the nine provinces with anglophone majorities—that is to say, a Constitution resting on one pillar of support rather than on the two pillars which are absolutely necessary in this country to sustain a Constitution and keep it from toppling over and crashing down. Believing as I have been led to believe all my life in the essential duality of our Confederation; believing as I do that any constitutional arrangement which, from its inception, does not respect that duality, and is not supported by both the English and French communities, is doomed to failure, I would vote against the measure as it now stands.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, may I address a question to Senator Murray? His speech is deeply felt, I know, but could he explain the reasons why his leader in the other place, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, voted in favour of the resolution, which is now before us, and why he differs so greatly in his conclusions with that of the Leader of the Opposition in the other place?

Senator Murray: I do differ from the conclusion of my national leader. I recognize that my honourable friend is in good company in voting in favour of the resolution. I do not think I differ materially from Mr. Clark in his analysis of the situation. Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition in the other place, in casting his vote in favour of the resolution, expressed explicitly the hope and expectation that the time between the passage of the resolution in the house, and its debate here, would enable the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec—and perhaps the Senate—to make the kind of amendments that would reconcile, if not the Government of Quebec, certainly the federalists in Quebec—

Senator Flynn: He asked again today.

Senator Murray: And he asked again today, for measures proposed in the Senate that would reconcile Quebec to the patriation of the Constitution under circumstances that were acceptable to that province and to the French-speaking majority of that province.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I should like to say that I will not keep you long. That is one of the blessings of sitting here listening to honourable senators who have said many of the things that I had planned to say.

First, I wish to dwell on the small problem of the Gang of Eight. Many Canadians were concerned as to the decision they would arrive at in regard to the Constitution. Fortunately, the Gang of Eight saw the light and did what was in the best interests of Canada, with the exception of the Premier of Quebec. His decision was made of his own free will. This evening a great deal of time has been spent on this matter. It is up to the Province of Quebec to make its decision as to whether it is going to come back in and build, together with all the other provinces, a united Canada. I do not wish to say anything further on that subject.

This evening I wish to speak briefly on sections 34 and 35. The word "existing" is bothering a number of Canada's native Indians. Section 35 says:

• (2240)

The existing aboriginal and treaty rights—

There is some misgiving as to exactly what that word "existing" will mean in the future, particularly with regard to the well-being and welfare of Canada's native Indians. Perhaps another word would have been more appropriate and more useful. However, the few responsible Indian leaders with whom I have spoken on the subject are quite prepared and willing to overlook their misgivings about that word and they will go along with the federal and provincial governments' decision to patriate the Constitution.

There is another problem concerning the Indian people. The Constitution Act is a made-in-Canada act, and Canada's native Indians believe that this Constitution Act will eventually do away with the present British North America Act. I do not know whether that will be the result of this made-in-Canada act which involves and concerns Canada's native Indians. That question will remain unanswered for some time to come. However, many of Canada's native Indians are prepared to agree with the decision to patriate the Constitution, although there is the possibility that a number of Indians will again be going to the United Kingdom to beat their tom-toms, and their actions may have a far-reaching effect.

I repeat that the word "existing" bothers me a good deal. Let me now cast your minds back to 1944, which is not such a long time ago. The then Prime Minister of Canada announced the introduction of the baby bonus, which eventually became the Family Allowance. If my memory serves me right, the first payment was made in 1945. When Mr. Mackenzie King, the then Prime Minister, made the announcement, he stated clearly that the Eskimos—at that time there was no such word as "Inuit"—would participate and be involved in the scheme; but he also stated clearly that Canada's native Indians would not be involved and would not receive the baby bonus because they were wards of the government. My point is that at that time the Eskimo people were equal to any other citizens of Canada; yet somewhere along the line, some time much later, the Eskimo people, who by then were known as "the Inuit," were demoted in status, and without consultation they were placed under the jurisdiction of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I now refer to section 35(2) of the Resolution, which reads as follows:

(2) In this Act, "aboriginal peoples of Canada" includes the Indian, Inuit and Métis peoples of Canada.

In the very near future the Métis, too, are going to be demoted and possibly brought under the administration of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, because they are now going to be aboriginals. Up to today they have been citizens of this land, equal to any other person in Canada, but this addition will increase, possibly more than tenfold, the responsibility that the Government of Canada has towards the Indian people and the Inuit, again without consultation. The Métis people are equal to any other Canadians, because they are only involved as Canadians, and rightly so.

I have been asked, "Is this what patriation is all about—to demote the status of those who are related to the first citizens of this land?" I must say that I have no answer. I hope that this is not the purpose of patriation.

I hope also that the Canada Act will mean that the Indian people will have input into the changing of certain legislation pertaining to the Canada Act in the future, from time to time, so that they can help to create a better Canada for the Indians, who were here before any other citizens, and so that they may be able to enjoy it more.

There are many other things that I would have liked to say. I do, however, have some sympathy for you. You are a bit tired, and perhaps I am too.

I would like to quote to you now one of the late chief Dan George's laments, or soliloquies, given at the time of celebration by Canada of its hundredth birthday. I am not going to quote the lament as a whole, because I am sure that many of you have read it. The second-last paragraph reads as follows:

Oh God, like the Thunderbird of old I shall rise again out of the sea. I shall grab the instruments of the white man's success—his education, his skills—and with these new tools I shall build my race into the proudest segment of your society. Before I follow the great chiefs who have gone before us, oh Canada, I shall see these things come to pass. I shall see our young braves and our chiefs sitting in the houses of law and of government, ruling and being ruled by the knowledge and the freedoms of our great land. So shall we shatter the barriers of our isolation. So shall the next hundred years be the greatest in the proud history of our tribes and nations.

The late chief did not see or realize his dreams, and I hope the next hundred years will bring equality and unity to this great land.

I have spoken.

• (2250)

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I shall be very brief in my remarks. I hesitated to involve myself in the debate in view of the lateness of the hour, but I am reminded of a musician friend of mine who was touring South America. He came across a giant talking bird that spoke five languages, including French. His mother lived alone in Victoria and he thought that this bird, which spoke the two official languages, would make a wonderful gift for her. He paid $3,500 for the bird and shipped it home. When he finished the tour, he visited his mother and asked, "Did you get the bird?" She replied, "Yes, I did." He said, "Well, how was it?" She answered, "It was delicious." He said, "How could you? I paid $3,500 for that bird. He spoke five languages," and she retorted, "Well, he should have said something."

So, honourable senators, feeling somewhat like that bird, I did not want to leave this chamber without saying something.

I, too, am impressed with the high level of the constitutional debate, but I trust you will forgive me if I lower its level somewhat.

There are many ordinary Canadians who feel, as a result of all of the publicity on the Constitution, that it will solve all of their problems. It is the panacea of perfection because consensus has now been reached. I think there are many people of less experience, understanding and wisdom than the members of this chamber. These people do not really understand all of the implications of this Constitution. Many of them have expressed concerns to me, which I want to share with you.

I am pleased that included in the opening is the guarantee of rights and freedoms, the protection of freedom of peaceful assembly and the freedom of association. Honourable senators will remember the situation of a few weeks ago here on the Hill, when tens of thousands of ordinary Canadians protested. I suspect that that kind of demonstration will be repeated. I suspect that this section of the Constitution will be tested very often.

While I share the concerns that were expressed by many Canadians about high interest rates, unemployment problems, and so on, I want to digress for a moment to say that I disassociate myself from the remarks made by the leader of the Canadian Labour Congress which were directed, as personal attacks, to the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition. I think we can express our views on the merits of an issue without attacking the leaders. However, if we do not deal with the problem that created the need for the peaceful assembly about which I spoke—that is, the question of high interest rates—if we continue this business of reporting a 98 per cent increase in the profits of the Bank of British Columbia, and a 50 per cent increase for the Royal Bank, if we in the government of the day do not deal with those kinds of problems, this section of the Constitution will be tested repeatedly.

I should also like to deal with the question of mobility rights. I believe it forms an important part of the Constitution. We are thereby granted the right to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province. There are, however, some practical problems that flow from this section. A great deal of concern has been expressed to me with regard to mobility rights. I am advised, and I have no reason to doubt the information, that one of the concerns expressed by Quebecers is that they do not want people coming to their province to work. If that is their position, as a friend I say that they are wrong.

Honourable senators, when I say “as a friend,” may I also say that I realize I have no right to speak for Quebec, other than as a caring Canadian with a few credentials as regards Quebec. In my life outside of this chamber I represent an organization that has 25,000 members living in Quebec. A good number of those members provide a major contribution to the leadership of our organization. When it was my decision to buy a national headquarters in the east, prior to the referendum, I bought it in Quebec. I did not come here to Ontario. I think that is a demonstration of the fact that I care very deeply about what happens in Quebec.

[Senator Lawson.]

However, to return to the question of mobility rights, I will say that people have said to me, “Wonderful, we now have the opportunity to move from province to province. We can go from New Brunswick to Alberta to be unemployed. We can go from Ontario to B.C. to be unemployed.” Honourable senators, it is a fine thing to have this right enshrined in the Constitution, but the practical application of it concerns the availability of jobs.

We talk about encouraging the youth of the country. We express concern because our youth is turned on to drugs, alcohol and the pleasures of the flesh. What opportunity, though, do we give them? We guarantee mobility rights, we guarantee educational rights, and then we take large numbers of graduates—law school graduates, teachers, and many other kinds of graduates—and have them working as waiters and waitresses, bellhops, cab drivers and so on. If we are going to turn them on to a meaningful role as participants in Canada under the Constitution, then we had better have some concerns about the practical application of these kinds of problems. There must be opportunity for jobs.

Many construction workers say to me, “Yes, you give us the opportunity to move to the major projects that will be built across the country, but how can we afford to?” I might say with respect to major projects in Quebec and in the rest of Canada, such as the tar sands and the Kitimat project, many hundreds of Quebecers have made major contributions to the building of those projects, and that is as it should be. There should be this free mobility. But then I say, “What about this unaware, uncaring Minister of Finance who says, ‘Yes, move, go to these major jobs,’ and then imposes a tax of $10, $20 or $30 a day on the free room and board which they have because they have to keep two homes?” Those of us who are members of Parliament in both houses have a tax-free allowance because we keep two homes, and that is as it should be. So they say, “What about the inequality and the unfairness of the Minister of Finance imposing these kinds of penalties, discouraging the incentive that is supposed to be created to allow us, as Canadians, to move freely to build a better country?”

These are the kinds of concerns that are expressed about translating some of these things into practical action. It seems to me, if we are to have the equality that is guaranteed by the Constitution, that there had better be a lot of concern by those who make up the government for the practical application of making it happen and making it meaningful. That to date has not been the case.

There is a great army of Canadians who are expressing these concerns and are waiting urgently for some action to be taken so that they can be participants in building the meaningful Canada that the Constitution purports to create for all of us. However, in expressing that urgency, and trying to be as brief as possible, I must say that, having had a great deal of experience in negotiations, the one thing I recognize in negotiations, at long last, is the point at which those negotiations are over. I recall being involved in major negotiations when the employer made a final offer and the employees turned it down and went on strike, and the employer said,

"How could you?" The employees said, "But you made a final offer." He said, "Yes, but it wasn't my final, final offer, and it should never have happened."

Well, I am satisfied that what we have before us is a final, final offer. I share the concerns that have been expressed in some of the excellent speeches I have both heard and read, and I agree with some of the amendments proposed by Senator Walker and others. While I have a sympathy on the one hand and a shared belief in some of those proposed amendments, on the other hand I am more overwhelmed by the sense of urgency that we must get on to dealing with some of the real problems affecting the country as a whole. Because of that and notwithstanding those concerns, and bearing in mind the decision of the provinces, the decision of the federal government and the effect of the major lobby of many concerned Canadians about aboriginal rights and women's issues and so on, I can read the signs that negotiations are over and that for me to participate in proposing amendments or supporting amendments would be merely to delay. Because of the sense of urgency I recognize on the part of many caring Canadians, I will vote to support the proposed resolution so that we can take our place in trying to build the kind of real Canada in which we can meet all of the practical problems we face and which I think we had better address in a hurry.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, tonight must be your night to hear from British Columbia. As a matter of fact, the speeches you will have heard tonight probably cover the ideas and outlook and the concerns of British Columbians in a rather broad fashion, and that is probably all to the good. Senator Williams and Senator Lawson have given you their position. I shall now try to give you another stance or point of view on the Constitution.

Honourable senators, I know you would not be here in this illustrious chamber today had you not already demonstrated your devotion and dedication to our beloved country. Your ideals and wisdom are being extended to their limits in these trying days. We are all weary of this debate. It would be easier to accept the constitutional proposal and wash our hands of it. We are beset by other important issues which require our immediate attention, but I urge you, with all the strength of my convictions, to take one more necessary step and examine the substance of the resolution. You must bring to bear your undoubted wisdom and experience in judgment of it.

● (2300)

We are not bound by an Accord that was reached by the provincial governments and the federal government. In our system Parliament is supreme. While we must consider the recommendations of governments, our responsibility is to the people of Canada, not to governments. The resolution before us, with no mandate from the electorate, demands our closer scrutiny. The government has ignored and the public is not aware that this resolution contravenes a most important constitutional convention, that no important constitutional change be implemented before it has been an issue in the immediately preceding general election. Neither the Right Honourable the Prime Minister nor any one of the provincial premiers has such a mandate from the electorate. The Canadian people have no knowledge of the importance and far-reaching effects of this resolution and, certainly, they have not given their consent. What is government without the knowledge and consent of the electorate? It is considered tyranny.

During the debate on this topic in April, I suggested that the resolution should include only three things—patriation of the British North America Act, an agreed-upon amending formula and a reconfirmation of Canada's status as a constitutional monarchy—and that all else could be accomplished in Canada in good order and at its appropriate time. Now, here we are in December, all these months later, and I still feel, more strongly than ever, that those are the only essential three ingredients necessary to this resolution.

Why should a Charter of Rights not be entrenched? Entrenchment of a Charter of Rights in the Constitution removes the sovereignty of Parliament. Since the sovereignty of Parliament is the cornerstone of our constitutional framework, only a general election with the Canadian people fully understanding the enormity of the change could give Parliament a mandate to entrench a Charter of Rights. Any other course is nothing but a coup d'état—legal, perhaps, but a coup d'état—which has as its dictionary definition, "a sudden, decisive political move involving abuse of authority."

How does entrenching a Charter of Rights in the Constitution change our form of government fundamentally? In the simplest terms, by exchanging a dynamic system for a static system, by exchanging sovereignty of Parliament for sovereignty of courts. Senator Molgat said that we must take the next step forward, we must move. There is another body of opinion which says that under the Canadian parliamentary system we have achieved a high standard of civilization, that entrenching the Charter of Rights will be a step backward, not forward and that we would go further back to square one and start all over again at Magna Carta. I would like to quote from Edward Jenks, History of English Law, the 5th edition:

Statute law is binding law of the highest authority . . . however apparently absurd and unjust an Act of Parliament, yet, if the words are clear, there is no court that has the power to defeat the intent of the legislature.

It must be appreciated that the procedure adopted by the Prime Minister in this resolution makes the United Kingdom Parliament the omnipotent legislature that is referred to, which will be binding on the Supreme Court of Canada. At the same time, it forever bars the United Kingdom Parliament from correcting any injustice or absurdity arising from interpretation. The Parliament of Canada is equally barred from such corrective action because the Charter is entrenched. An impasse is thus produced in which we cannot safely predict what the law will be.

Few Canadians appear to realize that, at a single blow, the entrenched Charter of Rights will totally expunge 1,000 years' accumulation of common law protection which has produced Canada's enviable position of unsurpassed freedom and individual rights.

There is no necessary connection between justice and rights. Justice is based on morality, fairness and consideration of both sides of an issue. Rights can be pre-emptive, one-sided and brutal—"I want my rights no matter who gets hurt." A right is an obligation imposed on someone to deliver or accord to a person or persons claiming the right without regard to the consequences of others. Rights are the selfish assertions by which the sick go untended, children untaught, the public deprived of communications, homes and businesses destroyed, and the country divided against itself.

Justice is embodied in the principles and practices of the common law which, as United States Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes noted, is "rooted in Holy Scripture and broadened down from precedent to precedent for fifteen hundred years", corrected and modernized where necessary by the sovereign power of Parliament.

The concept of justice includes rights, but the concept of rights does not include justice. A responsible government in a parliamentary system is, or should be, responsive to change, responsive to the needs of the people and in tune with socio-economic realities. A codified, rigid constitutional form of government, by its very nature, needs different checks and balances from ours if it is not to oppress.

We are now being driven, without the consent of the electorate, down the road from justice to rights in the course of which we shall lose the protection of the common law and witness the loss of Parliament's sovereignty.

The proposed Charter is also dangerous for what it leaves out. In April, as reported at page 2354 of Debates of the Senate, I quoted clause 26 of the Charter which states:

The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed as denying the existence of any other rights or freedoms that exist in Canada.

At that time I said:

The rights which exist today but not specified in the Charter—such as property... suggest, by their subordinate placement, that they are of lesser importance and would be legally subordinate to the extent they were in conflict with the specified rights. If they are to be judged equally, the specified rights have no particular significance at all. That would seem to be perverse if it is intentional.

Since the protection of property rights is one of the Senate's four particular responsibilities, we should look at that matter more closely. Since April, opportunities have arisen to include property rights in the charter, and since the inclusion was denied, there can be no doubt that the exclusion was intentional. The Prime Minister and the provincial premiers, in effect, have conspired against the individual's right to own property. Why? The courts, presumably, would more readily allow expropriation.

Three thousand years ago, it was proclaimed in the Bible, in the Book of Micah, chapter 4, verse 4:

But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid.

[Senator Bell.]

That is the essence of the matter. Secure, individual, private property is essential to freedom from fear. Without the security of inalienable private property, the individual and the human family are open to coercion and deprivation and must live in fear of them.

It has been said that where property is not held in high regard, human life is not held in high regard. As Professor E. L. R. Williamson so aptly puts it:

Private property and basic living space is a biological necessity which can be scientifically demonstrated in the laboratory or in nature. Insecurity and overcrowding are the root causes of the vast wave of mental illnesses, aberrant behaviour, and crime now overwhelming most of the urban areas of North America. If so socially essential a right as private property requires no constitutional protection, then why do we require the more than 30 clauses which are in the Charter of Rights?

Professor Williamson continues:

Could there be a reason why government would not desire to secure private property as an inalienable right? Yes. In the eyes of the letter of the law, a corporation is an individual, an artificial person. If the right of a real individual to possess private property can be called into question or at least not guaranteed, then the right of the corporation is equally weakened and the socialization or confiscation of the corporation's property by the government made much easier.

Every generation must fight the battle for parliamentary supremacy over executive power. The battle is never won for all time. The price of freedom is eternal vigilance.

Let the government show cause why our parliamentary system is not working, cannot be made to work, and why a new system should be imposed.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, since entrenching the proposed Charter of Rights is the only seriously divisive and controversial part of the resolution, and since any other desirable amendments can and should be made here in Canada after repatriation, I move, seconded by Senator Deschatelets:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 be amended

(a) by deleting therefrom Parts I, II, III, IV and VI and sections 54 and 59 of Part VII;

(b) by deleting the first line of section 58 and replacing it with the following:

"This Act shall"; and

(c) by renumbering the remaining Parts and sections accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Bell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Deschatelets:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 be amended

(a) by deleting therefrom Parts I, II, III, IV and VI and sections 54 and 59 of Part VII;

(b) by deleting the first line of section 58 and replacing it with the following:

"This Act shall"; and

(c) by renumbering the remaining Parts and sections accordingly.

Pursuant to the Order made by this honourable chamber on December 2, 1981, the recorded vote is deferred.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, the good news is that I understand that I am the last speaker for this evening.

Senator Flynn: We knew that in advance. What is the bad news?

Senator Austin: The bad news is that I may not have words entirely acceptable to every corner of this chamber.

Senator Flynn: What else is new?

Senator Austin: My words are as sincerely meant as those spoken by any other honourable senator who has spoken or who will speak during this debate.

I am the fourth senator in a row from British Columbia to speak in this debate. I take it that this is the heavy end of the batting order and that the final home run will be swung on and hit by Senator Perrault when he closes the debate tomorrow.

Honourable senators, we are at last in the final moments of a movement for constitutional reform which is as old as Confederation itself.

● (2305)

While the Fathers of Confederation achieved the founding of a popular democracy based upon British parliamentary practices and succeeded in beginning the linking of all of the British possessions in the northern half of the North American continent into a nation, they were not able to complete many of the tasks of modern nationhood. The Canadian nation in 1867 remained subject to the law making of Great Britain, and under its control in its ability to pass many domestic laws or to play any role of its own in foreign not only those.

With the Statute of Westminster in 1931, the British dominions were allowed their constitutional and legal autonomy from Great Britain. Regrettably, Canada—the Right Honourable R.B. Bennett, later Viscount Bennett, then being Prime Minister—could not settle for itself the question of an amending formula, and, therefore, in legal terms and domestic political terms the colonial link remained. The depression of the 1930s and the world war of the 1940s set aside the process of constitution building in Canada. The process gained momentum at the beginning of the 1950s, under Prime Minister St. Laurent and has been on the national agenda of every prime minister since.

From Viscount Bennett to the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau seven prime ministers and 12 constitutional conferences have addressed the problem of patriation and an amending formula. Beginning with the 1950 conference, the question of a Charter of Rights was added to the constitutional agenda. The matter was raised by Prime Minister St. Laurent and aggressively supported by the then Premier of Saskatchewan, Tommy Douglas. Under Prime Minister John Diefenbaker serious efforts were again made.

I want to acknowledge the work of a fellow British Columbian, the Honourable Davie Fulton, who was Minister of Justice in the Diefenbaker government. His energy and intelligence seemed to make a breakthrough possible. Mr. Fulton has contributed a great deal to public life in Canada, and I am sorry that he was not able to achieve the success in constitution making that he so eagerly sought.

Under Prime Minister Pearson the work went on, and the Minister of Justice, the late Honourable Guy Favreau, again nearly achieved consensus with what became known as the Fulton-Favreau formula. Again the goal was just beyond the grasping.

The Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau, when he became Prime Minister in 1968, continued the momentum of the Diefenbaker and Pearson efforts, which led to the holding of the now famous 1971 meeting of first ministers in Victoria. It appeared at first that consensus had been achieved among the federal and all ten provincial governments. However, within days of the agreement the Province of Quebec was out, for reasons that have nothing to do with the nature and quality of the amending formula.

Again, in 1975, Prime Minister Trudeau renewed his attempts at patriation with a long and complicated series of steps, including first ministers' conferences, the introduction of Bill C-60 in the House of Commons, the reference of Bill C-60 to the Supreme Court of Canada, and meeting after meeting followed failure after failure at the federal-provincial level, all leading to the ultimate federal decision to proceed unilaterally with the Joint Resolution.

The decision of the present government to proceed unilaterally in October 1980, following the notorious failure of the September 1980 first ministers' conference, was the first cut through the Gordian knot of modern constitutional reform. The debate in the Senate and the vote which we will take tomorrow will be the last and severing cut which will finally free this nation of the vestiges—

Senator Flynn: Are you sure of that?

Senator Austin: —of its colonial and legal dependency on Great Britain, allow our nation-building to continue based on a workable amending formula agreed to by nine provinces and the federal government, and give us a Charter of Rights made in Canada by Canadians for Canadians.

The majority of Canadians have held these aspirations for a very long time. At this moment in our history, having seen these achievements slip from the grasp of able men who seemed to have them within achievement, let us not now join the parade of those who tried and lost. Let us complete this task in a spirit of goodwill that all of us have felt across the nation in the last five weeks since the agreement of November 5 was reached between the federal government and nine of the provincial governments, and enhanced by subsequent changes to that agreement redressing questions of legal equality of men and women and of aboriginal rights which were improperly excluded in the first instance at the behest of most of the provinces.

● (2310)

I said earlier that the decision to proceed unilaterally should be recognized as, and credited for, the ultimate achievement which we in the Senate have the power to complete by our final decision on the resolution. We have seen decades of failure and frustration, and none worse than the disappointments leading to and including the September 1980 federal-provincial conference. What gave us momentum and changed Canadian history was the decision to proceed, if necessary, in this Parliament alone and without the consent of the majority of the provinces. That decision to proceed unilaterally was not by itself enough, but it got the ball rolling. The take-off point in the momentum was the decision of the Trudeau government to set up a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada and to give it the authority to hold hearings at which Canadians in every activity of life and from every part of Canada could come and give their opinion and advice.

The debates of the first ministers produced a stalemate. The force of will of the people of Canada, expressed in the constitutional process in the form of the joint committee, and the members of the Senate and House of Commons representing the political parties of this Parliament in that joint committee, created the dynamic which became unstoppable.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: The voice of the people, as expressed to Parliament through the joint committee, demanded legal and social change, demanded legal and social reform, and demanded that we be successful.

I had the honour to be chosen by the Senate to be one of the the permanent Senate representatives on the special joint committee. I have said before, and I repeat it, that it was a rare privilege to play a role in the work of that committee and to be a part of its historic success. In particular, we built a Charter of Rights which even with the amendments to be required by a substantial number of provinces, expressed in the November 5 agreement, is still a caring and tolerant statement by Canadians of who they are and what they stand for in terms of their relationships with one another.

I wish to pay my respects to the Senate joint chairman, Senator Harry Hays, for his outstanding work.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: He exhibited a never-failing intelligence and sense of humour that carried the committee past difficult points. I want to congratulate all of my colleagues in the Senate who participated. None failed to give it their commitment and their concern.

Honourable senators will forgive me if I single out Senator Goldenberg for special mention. He has been involved in the constitutional process since 1934, and he is still a relatively young man, so he must have been a teen-age prodigy. Senator Goldenberg has been one of the leading advisers to prime ministers, including Prime Minister Trudeau, on constitutional reform and was present at the Victoria Conference in 1971 and many other constitutional events; and, of course, he was a member of the joint committee.

A touching moment occurred in the office of the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, following the passage of this resolution in the other place on Wednesday, December 2. Some of you may know that Ed Goldenberg, Senator Goldenberg's son, has spent several years as a key constitutional and legal adviser to Mr. Chrétien. Ed has been just as involved in the past few years as his father was with previous Ministers of Justice. Prime Minister Trudeau walked into Mr. Chrétien's office, and seeing him talking to Senator Goldenberg and his son, moved over and said, "Let the four of us have a picture taken together as a memento of the old and the new, two generations of Goldenbergs advising on constitutional reform." It brought tears to Senator Goldenberg's eyes.

In my brief perspective of events, I cannot ignore the role of the Supreme Court of Canada. The provinces, not content to leave the constitutional process to the political world, decided to ask the appeal courts of Manitoba, Quebec and Newfoundland a combination of legal and political questions. Senators are aware that the Manitoba and Quebec courts found the federal government's right to act unilaterally unhindered legally or by constitutional convention. The Newfoundland court decided otherwise.

The Supreme Court of Canada, on September 30 last, told the Canadian people that the federal government could proceed without provincial consent as a matter of law, but that it would be offensive to Canadian constitutional convention to do so without a substantial number of provinces concurring. It was the Supreme Court of Canada that sent the federal government and the provinces back to the bargaining table. The threat of federal unilateral action in accordance with law was the sanction that brought the provinces back to political negotiation. It was the cost of public disapproval of federal unilateral action without a clear and honest attempt to negotiate that restrained the unilateral action of the federal government and sent it back to the negotiations. So there resulted, on November 5, a political agreement on patriation, the amending formula, linguistic rights, job mobility, legal rights of equality between men and women, aboriginal rights, a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, rights of provinces to control their natural resources, and many other vital provisions. There resulted throughout Canada a general feeling of accomplishment on the part of Canadians everywhere in the evolution of the Canadian nation.

● (2315)

Prior to September 30, and the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, I favoured unilateral action by the federal government on the report of the special joint committee. The premiers' stalemate seemed permanent, for the reasons I gave here when I spoke on February 19 last. The stalemate had to be broken if national growth and social justice were to be realized in time to meet the needs of the many Canadian groups who were labouring under disadvantage and were growing restless under the burden.

The premiers' stalemate could have been broken by unilateral federal action, but as it turned out it was broken by the Supreme Court of Canada and the resultant political response of the federal and provincial governments, based on the widespread reaction and demands of Canadians. With that I am content.
